The Family Council

Editor's note: The Family Council consists of a judge, a psychiatrist, three clergymen, a newspaper editor a women's editor and two writers. Each article is a summary of an actual report. The Family Council does not give advice; it merely reports on problems that have been dealt with by responsible agencies and counselors.

....Frank S. – My wife drives the kids.

Anne S. – They can do better.

Frank S. – My wife and I are having a serious disagreement about the way our children are brought up.

We have three school-age youngsters and they are all doing about average work in school. They are good kids, no special troubles – except that my wife keeps driving them to do better.

The oldest boy recently started to develop a stammer and I think it could be as a result of my wife's making too many demands on him. I feel that she is making him nervous.

I don't see anything so terrible in being only average in school. I was and I know I'm happier in my life than some of the guys who always came out on top.

• • •

Anne S. – I certainly don't see anything so terrible in being average – if you really are that. But our kids all have high IQ's. One of the teachers told me that when I asked her about it. The oldest boy, particularly, has a very high IQ.

I ask myself all the time why my smart children somehow don't make out too well at school. The oldest boy is on the lazy side and a bit of a dreamer, but the other two are very alert. They both say they get very nervous before tests and can't think well.

I would not drive the children if I weren't sure they could do better. It just riles me to see other kids get ahead of them when I know it's not necessary.

• • •

The Council: If it is true that these children have superior IQ's we can find one good reason why they would do only average work – and that is their mother's driving ambition for them.

Educators agree that one of the biggest factors in a child's doing schoolwork that is up to the peak of his ability is the comfort of feeling completely secure in the love of his parents. When a parent places too great a stress upon achievement the child gets the idea that he isn't loved very much for himself.

This idea is no illusion either. A parent who wants his child to be outstanding is looking for some reflected glory. It is on thing to want a child to bring out the best in himself for the sake of his own greatest happiness and quite another to want to see that child covered with glory. Every child has some assets that can be brought out and that will win a degree of recognition. However, the mother who gets "riled" when other children get ahead of hers may not only defeat her own ends, but takes all the joy out of doing and learning.

Anne should consider the possibility that her excessive interest in having the children shine may have resulted in her getting a false impression. A teacher, responsive to her maternal pride and ambition, may have said that the IQ's were high when she meant high enough or average-high. The "very high" of the oldest boy indicates something more, but it is most unfair to him to set a rigid standard for his performance. This boy may be the kind of "dreamer" who finds school too dull and routine, but who will eventually find something that captures his interest and will then prove his mettle.

It is quite possible that the stammer has been caused by his mother's pressure. His parents should not call attention to it or ask him to repeat words. They should seek help from a child guidance clinic.
