Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

They Have a Lot of Legs, But Far Short of a Thousand

The "something that crawled out from under the rock" in all probability was either a millipede or a centipede, for these creatures, neither bug, insect, worm nor larvae, have scared people half to death ever since curious folks have turned over stones, peered into dark crevices in rotted tree-stumps or moved a board in a neglected back-yard.

The millipede has been called a "thousand legged worm." Regardless of how leggy the millipede looks it falls far short of having a thousand legs. It is "way short", the creature lacks about 836.

The millipede's body is as flexible as a rubber band. It can move in and out of crevices with exactly the ease with which a stream of water flows over a gravel bed. The body is composed of 82 body segments. Each body segment is a distinct section and each section is equipped with two pairs of jointed legs; 164 legs in all. Looked at closely under a strong glass, the millipede's legs have both knees and elbows.

Like an Engine

Up front, and leading all 82 segments, is the animal's head hooked onto the segments like an engine to a train of cars. The body itself is round in cross section, tan or dark brown in color.

With the multiple extremities they possess it would be natural to suppose the millepedes would be lightning fast on their feet but actually they are relatively slow. Too many legs seem to be a slight handicap. The creature can't seem to get them all going fast enough to carry itself with any great speed.

Perhaps the illusion of speed, described by those scared folks who accasionally see a millipede, comes about at the sight of so many legs all working in unison, giving the creature the appearance of speed. The cousin of the millipede, the centipede, outmoves the first by several jerks.

No Poison

Although the millipede looks vicious, they are harmless and possess no poison organs. Unlike the centipede, who has less legs and whose name means "hundred-legged," the millipede is just frightening without being dangerous.

The centipede has the front pair of its legs connected to organs that contain venom. However, these do not pose any danger to humans.

Although called worms, insects, bugs and many other things, the millipedes belong to a class of animals known as anthropods. They feed on decayed vegetable matter and prefer to spend their uninteresting lives just where you would expect to find such misfits, under a stone rolled up in a tight little ball with all their 160 legs wrapped about their squirmy selves.

Nusbaum Moved to Lewiston Office

W. V. Nusbaum, manager of the Medford Social Security office since October, 1954, has been transferred to the Lewiston, Idaho, office as manager. The transfer is effective June 15.

He will be succeeded here by Ed Jacobson, assistant manager of the Santa Ana, Calif., office, who is to report to Medford in the near future.
