The Inquiring Mind

This series of articles, on many different subjects, results from work by senior students at the school of journalism at the University of Oregon. Each is a condensed version of a full-length thesis written as partial requirement for graduation at the school.

By Charlene O'Dell
The wild gunplay of the Westerns, the brawl in which the frontier saloon is taken apart board by board, the sinister atmosphere of a crime drama—all of these have now become a real and vivid part of the daily lives of America's youth.
Many of today's children—unlike their elders—have never known a world without movies and television. Today—directly or indirectly—these forms of entertainment inescapably touch every child, and no amount of parental care can prevent this.
How do these forms of entertainment influence and shape the attitudes of children and what ideas do they instill in their developing minds? Authorities are becoming increasingly concerned about whether or not there is a direct link between crimes committed by juveniles and crimes portrayed in motion pictures and on TV screens.
Subtle Distortion
Just because it cannot be proven that crime stories are invariably a basic cause of juvenile delinquency and always produce fears and frustrations, it does not follow that they are relatively harmless to children. The most dangerous effect of television and movies is the subtle distortion of human values they produce. When America's youth get out of horror and violence programs is the idea that kindness, sympathy and regard for human suffering are all weaknesses, and that cunning and shrewdness are the attributes that count. Many of the shocker-shows stimulate unhealthy sexual attitudes and lead children to look on cruelty and violence as a normal way of life.
What the movies and TV need at present is a rollback of sadism. The child who gradually absorbs more and more crime and violence tends to become callous toward human nature. To him, suffering and bloodshed are all a part of daily living. It is then that children begin to confuse violence with strength, sadism with sex, low necklines with femininity, racial prejudice with patriotism and crime for heroism.
Majority Bad
It's the bad things that TV and the movies do that unfortunately command most attention. The majority of the programs and movies planned for children have to do with crime and/or violence. Untrained viewers may miss this proportion because they don't realize that crime is crime, and violence is violence, even in the patriotic setting of a Western locale or in the science-fiction setting of interplanetary space. If a person is looking for a realistically-telvised act of violence, his chances of finding one are statistically greater if he looks for it on a children's program. Even Walt Disney has resorted to the violence of Western drama in his Frontier Land series.
What has happened to Donald Duck and all his gang of fantasy favorites?
Many people do not realize fully what immense potentialities both television and the movies have. That seems to hold true for some of the producers and, in the ascending line of power, the sponsors and advertising agencies as well. In the motion picture industry, Hollywood makes many films to entertain adults and late teenagers, few for children. Producers think of a dull audience even when filming traditional children's classics. Of course, motion picture men may say that the cartoons are for the kiddies. But what about the cartoons? The majority of them are concerned with getting laughs from Tom the cat as he undergoes a variety of tortures or humiliations. They're all the same.
Responsibility Shirked
In view of this evidence, Hollywood is shirking a definite responsibility. Not only is Hollywood closing its eyes to ethics, but the theater owners as well are shirking a regulative responsibility. Even if a movie is unsuitable, children are seldom refused admittance to it. The millions of kids who go to Saturday movies are a good source of income.
The greatest obstacle to the future of good TV and movies lies in the present-day cult of violence. We now need producers as much interested in character building as they are in shows that can be cheaply produced. If these industries would look to their own code of ethics and would adhere to the standards the children of today would be more likely to mature with healthy, normal attitudes about life and reality.
