

Oregon's Congressional Delegation Cooperating on Problems of State

A. ROBERT SMITH
Mail Tribune

Washington Correspondent
Behind the political front lines, where all the firing is coming from between members of Oregon's congressional delegation, there appears to be continued cooperation on legislative problems concerning the state.

There is no evidence to date of one senator sticking the knife in another's bill to the point of killing it, with the single exception of the Lilly Moore bill last summer that would have given an old house to the city of Roseburg. Sen. Wayne Morse killed it the day Sen. Richard L. Neuberger thought the Senate would pass his measure, after Rep. Charles O. Porter got it through the House. Morse demanded the city pay half its value.

Confer On Bill
Last Friday, on the other hand, legislative assistants from the offices of Morse, Neuberger and Rep. Al Ullman all conferred to draft a bill which their bosses expect to sponsor jointly concerning flooding out a town on the Columbia river when the John Day dam reservoir is completed.

Arlington, in Gilliam county, will be about half under water when the reservoir is filled. The Corps of Engineers has already been authorized to fill in this section of the town after the water rises, allowing the town to be moved back to its original location. But for legal reasons, legislation will be necessary to guarantee that the town gets the newly-filled land at its fair market value, rather than some private interest which might bid higher.

Thus the lines of communication remain open and busy between the offices of the members of the delegation, even though some of the members themselves are, for all practical purposes, not on speaking terms with one another.

Polite Fashion
The senators, to be sure, say "Hi Dick" and "Hi Wayne" in polite fashion when they encounter one another at a social function, as they did the night the Portland Chamber of Commerce invited them all to dinner at the Army-Navy club.

But they don't seek one another out. They appear to avoid one another most of the time on the floor of the Senate chamber where their desks are located about 25 feet apart.

However, recently they did engage in a floor discussion together briefly, when they were co-sponsoring an amendment to a California irrigation bill designed to safeguard the 160-acre land limitation law.

Unlike last year, there are no hot letters being exchanged in private between the senators or any others in the delegation, so far as could be determined. Morse, Rep. Edith Green and Ullman reportedly agreed among themselves not to have further personal con-respondents with Neuberger when he wrote to them last February inviting them to get together for breakfast.

No Breakfast Meetings
This year there have been no delegation breakfast meetings as such. Neuberger, Porter and Rep. Walter Norblad had one breakfast meeting to which the others refrained from attending. Then, ironically, they all had breakfast together later on when the League of Women Voters passed out the invitations. Some who attended the bi-weekly breakfast meetings, the five Oregon Democrats instituted in 1957 said they were the forum for some personal bickering and accomplished little of a substantive nature. They are glad they've been dropped, leaving inter-office cooperation for the occasions that demand it when a problem faces the state where congressional help may be the answer.

IDS Passes $3 Billion Mark in Net Assets

Investors Diversified Services Inc. has passed the $3 billion mark in net assets under management, James W. Ambler, Medford representative reported today.

The announcement was made just one month before the Company's 65th birthday and only three years after the $2 billion plateau had been attained in April 1956. The first billion dollar mark was reached in June 1952 and was doubled in less than four years.

Back Stairs: President's Autograph

By MERRIMAN SMITH
UPI White House Reporter

Washington - (UPI) - Back stairs at the White House:

Only rarely does President Eisenhower sign autographs in public. Usually, when he's at a banquet the people approach him with their menus to be signed, he smiles as graciously as possible and asks that they mail the cards to him. Eisenhower is pretty good about signing such things as menus and programs, even if it does on occasion take many weeks before they get back to the individual who made the request.

Firm Stand Dissolves
The President's firm stand, which, incidentally is quite encouraged by the Secret Service, dissolved the other night here when he had dinner with several thousand Republicans honoring the GOP members of Congress.

Movie actor John Wayne was the toastmaster and naturally he attracted a lot of autograph seekers. Armed with Wayne's signature, many of the diners then approached Mrs. Eisenhower. And the next step logically was to brace the President.

As he said later, he made his fatal mistake when he signed the first one. The next thing he knew, he was literally besieged. The front of the table where he was sitting was mobbed. Even waitresses who were supposed to be serving the meal put aside their trays for the moment and joined the mob.

Secret Service agents in front of the President stood their ground gamely, but they had their limitations. After all, this was a Republican dinner where the pew holders planked down $100 a plate.

Son Will Be Proud
One waitress ran along the edge of the head table waving an autographed menu and crying, "My son will be proud of me - even if I get fired for this."

The banquet manager of the Sheraton Park Hotel stood in the wings and glanced balefully at the hub-hub in front of Eisenhower.

At this point the question was how to cut off the autograph seekers without committing political sin.

There were whispered conferences between the Secret Service and the White House political expert Appointment Secretary Thomas E. Stephens. A quiet message was passed along to actor Wayne and he got to his feet to announce somewhat sadly that the crowd was getting too great and would the autograph seekers please desist immediately.

Then the President, far behind the other diners, got to eat a few mouthfuls of his dinner.

Covered Swearing in
One of Washington's most distinguished and best-liked reporters is Edward T. Follard of the Washington Post and Times Herald.

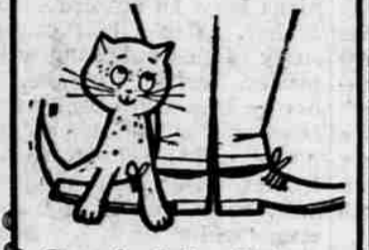

Eddie recently enjoyed a long vacation and returned to work in time to cover the White House swearing-in of Thomas S. Gates Jr., as Deputy Secretary of Defense in the White House conference room.

Per custom, the President after the ceremony moved down a line of Gates' relatives shaking hands. Because of the crowd in the room, Follard was pushed close to the end of the reception line. The next thing he knew, the President had grabbed his hand and was shaking it vigorously.

Then Eisenhower looked up and went into a movie-type double-take.

"Why, Eddie," the President burst out with a laugh, "What in the world?"

Follard retreated immediately from his new-found status as a member of the Gates family.
