IGY Study of Antarctic Yields Much Information

Washington—(Science Service)—United States scientists covered more miles crossing the Antarctic continent and made more scientific observations during these traverses than all other nations combined.

Albert P. Crary, who recently returned from more than two years in Antarctica, said the concerted International Geophysical Year effort to study the unknown continent had already yielded much new information. He told a news conference here that these studies included measurements of ice thickness and snow accumulations, and of temperature, winds and other meteorological information, some biological experiments, and charting of the gravitational and magnetic fields.

Ocean Depth Figured

Among the findings was an ocean bottom depth beneath the Ross Ice Shelf of about 4,400 feet below sea level, at latitude 79 degrees, six minutes south and longitude 165 degrees, 30 minutes east.

Another discovery was the existence in the Horlick Mountains of sandstone-shale coal beds containing leaf fossils and petrified tree remains 12 feet long. The coal beds varied in thickness from a few inches to a few feet. The Horlick Mountains extend eastward from the southeast end of the Ross Ice Shelf for hundreds of miles.

The U.S. Antarctic expeditions covered nearly 8,000 miles, spanning Antarctica from the Weddell Sea to the Ross Ice Shelf and into Victoria Land Plateau. Crary organized all of these traverses, and personally covered almost 3,100 miles of them.

Crary was loaned to the National Academy of Sciences' U.S.-IGY Antarctic program by the Air Force Cambridge Research Center.

Markers left at regular intervals over some parts of the routes taken during the traverses will help explorers in the future solve the knotty problem of whether the Antarctic glaciers are melting, growing or merely standing still, Crary said.

Agriculture Board Reviews Legislation

Salem—(UPI)—The State Board of Agriculture spent most of an all-day session here Tuesday reviewing new legislation administered by the department and considering how the board could be of greatest value to agriculture, consumers and the department itself.
