Doctor Undergoes 92nd Operation Because of Cancer

Chicago – (UPI) – Dr. Emil Grubbe, 84, who has given parts of his face and left arm to science, underwent his 92nd operation Thursday at Swedish Covenant hospital.

Doctors removed the first and fourth fingers of his right hand and a gland under his right arm to check the ravages of radiation burns and cancer suffered in years of research.

Discovery Gave Name

In 1895, Grubbe suffered a mysterious burn and swelling of his left arm following work with platinum, electrical current and a vacuum tube. A few weeks later, Wilhelm Roentgen announced discovery of X-rays, capable of penetrating solid objects. The discovery gave Grubbe a name for what had happened to him.

The many operations and racking pain are the price Grubbe has paid for his 60 years of research. But his experiments and study have given life and hope to thousands of cancer sufferers.

Attacks Joint Study

In an interview Wednesday, however, a proposed summit meeting to organize joint war against cancer came under attack from the stricken scientist.

Grubbe, author of more than 150 books and articles on X-ray and cancer research, said he doubted whether such a conference between East-West physicians would reveal complete findings.

The "summit" health meeting was proposed by Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), head of the senate subcommittee on reorganization and international organizations.

NEWEST ADDITION—Sir Winston Churchill squinches up his eyes to kiss his newest grandson, Rupert Christopher, after christening ceremony in London. The boy is the son of Captain Christopher Soames (right) and Sir Winston's youngest daughter, Mary (left). From the expression on his face, the baby doesn't seem to be too enthusiastic about the business.

Fabrics Made Insect-Proof

Los Angeles–(Science Service–A revolutionary new approach promises lifelong immunity for fabrics against textile-destroying insects which cause millions of dollars damage annually to carpets, upholstery and clothes.

The new technique has been developed by Roy J. Pence, an entomologist at the University of California, Los Angeles.

A colorless, odorless, harmless (to humans) compound can be used to impregnate fabrics during the dye-vat process, rendering the material "indigestible" to carpet beetles, clothes moths, and other insects for the fabric's lifetime.

It can also be applied in an aqueous solution to existing fabrics in the home.

Cottonseed Meal For Poultry, Swine

Washington– (Science Service) – Improved cottonseed meal is now fed to poultry and swine in addition to cattle, the U. S. Department of Agriculture has announced here. Before 1947, the use of cottonseed meal was limited because gossypol, a pigment contained in cottonseed, is toxic to poultry and swine. But scientists at the Agricultural Research Service's southern laboratory at New Orleans found processing techniques that lower the gossypol content but do not disturb the high protein level of the meal. Consequently, in 1958, cottonseed production stood at 300,000 tons, with 200,000 tons feeding California poultry, the Department of Agriculture stated.

RESIDENTS WIN

New York –(UPI)– The city agreed Thursday to let the Canarsie section of Brooklyn enjoy the pleasures of the past for at least a while longer. Residents of the section had objected to plans for putting an automatic gate in place of a manually operated one at a grade crossing where BMT tracks cross a street. The board of estimate tabled the proposal.

Tiny Amplifier Made for Missiles

Waltham, Mass – (Science Service) – A tiny match-head size rectifier has been developed here that is capable of withstanding the severe temperature changes and shocks experienced in missile computer systems.

The diffused silicon rectifier, used to change alternating current into direct current, is said to be several hundred times smaller and lighter than old-type rectifiers.

Developed by Clevite Transistor Products, the device can be used in airborne computer systems with 600-volt power supplies. It can handle up to 150 milliamps at 150 degrees centigrade.

Marked Whales Yield Age Data

London–(Science Service)–A male whale takes twice as long to reach sexual maturity as scientists had thought.

Previous estimates of this age, based largely on such things as counting the "rings" in whale bone or baleen, are in error, an Australian scientist reports here.

A study of two whales that had been marked several years ago has given scientists a "standard" for assigning whales a minimum age at maturity, W. H. Dawbin of the University of Sydney says. When they were recently re-examined it was possible to estimate maturity more accurately.

The minimum age for a mature male whale appears to be four years, the research says. The female may reach maturity earlier since the minimum age for that sex was estimated to be three years. With these ages as standards, researchers should now be able to use various organs for accurate estimations of a whale's age at maturity.

Brainwashing Shot Studied by Scientists

Urbana-Champaign, Ill. – (Science Service)–The "shots" that the American serviceman receives in the future may include a psychological shot against propaganda and brainwashing as well as the familiar typhoid, tetanus or diphtheria inoculations. Psychologists under the direction of Prof. William McGuire of the University of Illinois here are attempting to develop a method of immunizing against persuasion by gradually building up a resistance to propaganda as hayfever victims are given defense against pollen. The study is being made possible by a grant from the National Science Foundation.

Colorado ranks first in the nation in the production of molybdenum.

Bone Said From Oligocene Times

Princeton, N.J. – (Science Service)–A tiny piece of bone that has been in the American Museum of Natural History in New York for 50 years has been identified by a Princeton University paleontologist here as being 35,000,000 years old.

Thus, it is part of the oldest specimen yet discovered of a skull of the higher primates, the group that includes monkeys, apes and man.

Measuring less than an inch in diameter, the bone was deposited in a quarry in Egypt in the Early Oligocene Age. It was found about 50 miles southwest of Cairo about a half century ago by an American-Museum-sponsored expedition. Not until Princeton's Dr. Elwyn L. Simons recently explored a partially studied research collection in the American Museum, however, was the importance of the bone fragment realized.

Several scientists regard the find as a reinforcement of the belief that there were several kinds of monkey-like animals living in Egypt in early Oligocene times, Dr. Simons reported.

LOBSTER PARTY

New York–(UPI)–Police today sought a 38-year-old Haslem man who escaped from upper Manhattan Arrest Court after being arraigned on a shoplifting charge. Observers speculated they might find him on the waterfront. The man, Harrison O'Neil, was charged with stealing seven cans of lobster meat.
