Aerial Pictures Help Engineers

Syosset, N. Y.—(UPI)—Remember when civil engineers had to slog across field and stream by foot to map new highway routes?

Today, mountains and rivers are measured in the twinkling of a camera lens, thanks to photogrammetry, the technique of drawing contour maps from aerial photographs.

"It used to take a month to come up with a map of a six or eight mile strip of proposed highway, and the map showed a band only 500 feet wide," said Ford Bartlett, president of the consulting engineer firm of Lockwood, Kessler and Bartlett, Inc.

"Today, with electronics and optics, the map can be produced in a week showing a strip 1,000 feet wide," he added.

A major part of the photogrammetry technique involves the stereoplotter. After aerial photographs are taken of a proposed highway route, the photos are fed into stereoplotters, which produce a three-dimensional image on a plotting board. A skilled technician then traces over the image and comes up with contour lines.

From such calibrations, engineers can obtain statistical information by feeding the data into electronic computers. Of course, when double-checking is required, engineers still must do some ground work. But they can make this job easier with the aid of a tellurometer, a compact radar-like instrument that measures distance by the length of time it takes to send out and receive a microwave signal. This instrument, said Bartlett, can measure 40 miles in 40 minutes with a possibility of error of only 11 inches.

The first silk mill established in the United States was in Mansfield, Conn., in 1810. Power looms were introduced in about 1838.

Yale had the first course in geology in the U. S. in 1809.
