Flocculant May Lessen Uranium Loss

New York—(Science Service) A new flocculant, a settling agent for solid-liquid separations, may decrease uranium losses by more efficiently dividing the desired product from the waste. This high molecular weight polymer, called Superfloc 16 by its producers, American Cyanamid company, is said to be the most efficient settling aid yet developed.

In addition to its use in uranium mining, the new flocculant may be employed for treating water and suspensions of sewage, industrial wastes and chemical precipitates.
