Polio Virus Now Widespread Throughout U.S.

Washington (Science Service) - The polio virus is now widespread in communities throughout the country, a U.S. Public Health official said. Few areas of the country have, so far, escaped the effects of the virus. Paralysis has been reported from the north, south, east and west. Health officials are concerned most about the preschool children. They are the number one candidates for this crippling summer disease, Dr. Glenn Usher, communicable disease center, PHS, told Science Service. Studies have shown that the Salk shots do not appear to break the chain of infection from the polio virus. This means that a person can be immunized against polio, yet carry the virus and infect others, some of whom will not be strong enough to build up a natural immunity. Paralysis can then occur. The virus is usually accidentally swallowed by persons. Then it multiplies in the digestive tract. From there it is passed on in secretions from the nose and mouth or excreted. The virus can even pass from one person to another during a kiss. If a person has the virus in his digestive tract, he will not necessarily have polio, however, Dr. Usher said. Commenting upon the recent rise in incidence of polio in this country, he explained the following general theory held by many health officials: Polio hit the country heavily during the ten years prior to 1955. As a result, there was extensive natural immunity to the disease. In the several years since then, however, the Salk shots have not been given to enough people to fill the gap that natural immunity would have filled had the years since 1955 seen more polio. In other words, a child born in 1955 or thereafter would not have had the opportunity to build up a natural immunity as did her sister who was born in the ten years prior to 1955. The latest figures reveal that 166 paralytic cases were reported for the week ending July 18, setting the highest record for any week in 1959. The newly reported cases bring to 956 the total number of paralytic cases that have occurred this year.

Drop in Future Dental Decay to

Niagara Falls, N. Y. (Science Service)-The incidence of dental decay will drop sharply during the next 100 years, the president of the American Dental Association has predicted here.

Dr. Percy T. Phillips of New York spoke to colleagues gathered for the centennial anniversary of the association's founding. His prediction was based upon the role now played by water fluoridation, which he referred to as "one of the most significant public health developments in our era."

As dental decay problems decrease, there will be need to place increased emphasis on preventive measures for diseases of the gums, he added.

Looking to the second century of American dentistry, Dr. Phillips forecast a number of changes in the profession. They will come about, he explained, because of increased stress on scientific research as well as growing concern by the people over their dental needs.

One of the major problems facing dentistry will be to make dental care increasingly available to larger segments of the public, he added. He called for sound programs to provide more care for the aged as well as institutionalized and homebound persons.

Need also was cited for establishing dental departments in more of the nation's hospitals. The profession's chief concern is prevention of dental disease in children, he declared.

Reading Habits of Chemists Studied

Washington (Science Service)-The reading habits of research chemists and physicists are being investigated. Under a grant from the National Science Foundation here, the Operations Research group at Case Institute of Technology will find out 1. Types of scientific material read; 2. Whether it is for general or specific technical information, or for information sources; and 3. publication costs per page read.
