BILL BENDIX

WILLIAM BENDIX has made a fortune portraying the simple-minded, big-city ignoramus. Now he's spending the money living the life of a cultured country gentleman. What's more, the role fits him far better than the one he has played in movies and TV for years.

A visit with the Bendixes—Bill and his wife of 32 years, Therese—may start with a gentle game of croquet on the sweeping lawns of their new $70,000 "little place" in Tarzana, Calif. It's a disconcerting experience if you've grown accustomed to Bendix as the muddled factory worker in "The Life of Riley." It becomes more so when he talks with authority on interior decorating or recent trends in fiction.

But as the day progresses through a leisurely al fresco lunch on the patio, you realize Bendix is a good actor who through the years has deceived you into believing he knows nothing more than who's leading the National League in batting.

When you mention this, Bendix reveals some resentment. "I'm tired of people thinking I'm a 'boob' just because I play one professionally," he says. "Sure, I missed an education. Just didn't have the money, but while I could go to school I was an honor student. I wasn't brought up in an alley, either. My father was a violin teacher. My Uncle Max conducted in Carnegie Hall and Uncle Ted was first violinist with a symphony orchestra. Today if I make a comment on classical music, everybody laughs because I'm 'putting on airs.'"

In his day, though, Bill has "put on airs" with good reason. Therese and he spent the depression dodging landlords in cold-water flats, so when he tried the theater and achieved success
