Bed Rest Said Good Therapy for Stammering Child

New York (Science Service)—Bed rest is good therapy for the child that stammers, a psychiatrist said here. Usually, the child who stammers is so nervous rest will be very beneficial, especially if it is fortified with a sedative given under medical direction, Dr. C. S. Bluemel explained in Mental Hygiene, the publication of the National Association for Mental Health.

Meanwhile, whatever is causing the nervousness in the child should be discovered and eliminated, if possible. There may be too much competition at the family table, and no one may be listening when the little fellow is trying to talk. Still worse, an older brother or sister may snatch speech away from him, and thus put him at a constant disadvantage. Belief Nearly Correct

There is an old belief that children stammer because they think faster than they can talk. This is very nearly correct. Actually, a child does much of his thinking in eagerness and excitement, and he has many feelings and frustrations that could never be put into words, the retired psychiatrist, who lives in Englewood, Colo., explained. Even if he could calm his feelings and try to think his way into speech, he would often lack the vocabulary to express himself. Thus, he would encounter a speech block—a sort of road block in word-thinking.

Easily Broken
The thinly organized speech of a child is easily broken by such common stresses as the excitement of a party or picnic. The sustained excitement of Christmas festivities can disrupt a child's speech patterns more easily. Less conspicuous influences also break a child's speech. Family discord, the daily fear of a harsh teacher, or the neighborhood bully can cause anxieties and frustrations.

In primary stammering, the thinking process is confused. This leads to secondary stammering—the stammerer tries to force words out during the silence. Thereupon begins an unnatural phase of effort and struggle, and sometimes contortion. The child may even use his fists and his larger body muscles in a futile attempt to speak.

Heart Attack Can Result in Peptic Ulcers
Boston—(Science Service)—You can get an ulcer from having a heart attack, four researchers said here. The important point to keep in mind, they told colleagues, is that ulcer therapy should seriously be considered for persons who have suffered an acute heart attack.

Clinical studies by these investigators indicate that such heart attacks, known as myocardial infarctions, may be associated with increased gastric secretions. This means that old peptic ulcers can again become troublesome, or that new ones can appear, the doctors report in the New England Journal of Medicine (July 30). A peptic ulcer can occur on the mucous membrane of the esophagus, stomach or duodenum. It is caused by the action of the acid gastric juices.

This report does not propose to examine the controversial question of whether peptic ulcers occur more commonly in patients with coronary artery disease than in the general population, the scientists emphasized. Suddenly Complicated

Instead, on the basis of six cases on which their report is based, they wrote: "The course of acute myocardial infarction may be suddenly complicated by the development of serious manifestations of active peptic ulceration. . . . That such an association may be more than coincidental, however, is suggested by the occurrence of acute peptic ulceration during a variety of stressful situations."

Thus, anti-coagulants, drugs that delay blood clotting, should be withheld or used with extreme caution, Drs. Joseph C. Shipp, Victor W. Sidel, Robert M. Donaldson, Jr., and Seymour J. Gray, all of the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, Boston, concluded.

Nickels have been used as money in the U. S. for approximately 90 years.
