Pesticide Spray Declared To Be Dangerous To Man

Washington (Science Service) — The case of the airplane pilot who survived a crash uninjured, walked away from his downed plane and was dead within five hours is not a mystery.

The crash killed him — he was flying an agricultural aircraft containing 100 gallons of deadly parathion, a pesticide. The lid of the pesticide tank opened when the plane crashed and the pilot's clothes were soaked with the liquid "bug killer."

Although it is not always so easy to identify a pesticide as the killer, the National Office of Vital Statistics here has collected some mortality figures. Including those accidental poisonings where the cause of death may be due to pesticide poisoning, there were 61 fatalities in 1957. This is probably a conservative figure. The number seems to vary slightly from year to year, Miss Lillian Gualnick of the vital statistics office said.

Among the hundreds of chemicals being used now as pesticides and insecticides, it is the group known as organic phosphates that cause the most harm. Parathion, TEPP, demeton and phosdrin are the most poisonous. It takes only a few drops of the concentrated material to kill a man. Furthermore, these pesticides are easily absorbed by the body through the skin; contaminated clothing, and breathing dust or sprays are all known ways that the poison gains entrance to the body.

An effective antidote is available. However, prompt action is needed. Persons who use these organic phosphate compounds should be extremely careful in applying them and in caring for their protective equipment such as respirators, work clothing and masks. Soap and water destroys the chemicals rapidly and thorough washing is an effective protection.

Symptoms of poisoning include disturbed vision, extra fluid in the mouth, nose and lungs, marked increase in sweating and pin-point-sized pupils.
