Fingers Crossed On Damage Suits Against Ag Dept.

Salem—Ray Kelso, herbicide control supervisor, is keeping his fingers crossed because this is almost too good to be true: so far this year, he says, the state department of agriculture has received only three damage claims due to alleged losses resulting from use of chemical weed killers.

Last year 30 claims hit Kelso's desk. And the lowest of any previous year was eight claims.

Kelso is equally elated that so far this year no damage claim has involved drift of chemicals applied by any of the ground or air applicators licensed by the state. Last year, drift was one of the main causes of damages reported.

A brief account of the three claims filed this year:

Claim Against Utility

One is against a utility company. But the department's investigation showed a farmer and not the company spray rig caused the damage. An insurance company is working on a settlement.

The second claim involves use of a soil sterilant on a power sub-station. After a hard rain, a low spot at the sub-station washed out across a wheat field, damaging an acre of wheat. Settlement made.

The third and last complaint received to Aug. 12 involved a central Oregon potato field. This claim is under investigation.

Kelso admits it's still possible the department may receive damage claims on 1959 spraying operations, but in the past few, it any, have been received after early September.

Under the herbicide application law, the department is authorized to receive and investigate claims from any landowners who believe their crops have been damaged by application of these weed killing chemicals.

Clues Lacking in Slaying of Coed

Los Angeles—Police today were without a concrete lead to the identity of the killer of attractive University of Southern California coed Linda Edna Martin.

The 21-year-old coed's former husband, John L. Taylor, 24, was completely eliminated Wednesday as a possible suspect in the baffling case, police said.

Capt. Sidney Lambert said Los Angeles police received a "timetable" of Taylor's whereabouts at the time of the Sunday night slaying. Taylor was in Glenview or Evanston, Ill., during the "critical hours," according to the Illinois report.

Miss Martin, of Rockville Center, N. Y., was found stabbed three times and bleeding to death in the stairway leading to her fiancé's apartment. Police said she apparently was stabbed shortly after she stepped nude from her bath.
