

U. S. To Consider Any Disarmament Plan by Soviets

Washington—(UPI)—President Eisenhower made these points in his news conference today:—He said, in response to a question about Khrushchev's intention to unveil a new disarmament plan, that the United States will consider any disarmament plan that is proposed as long as it is self-enforcing. He said any disarmament plan, to be practical, must have the mechanism to make sure it is carried out. Mutual, universal disarmament is the one great hope of the world being able to live in peace, he said.

Agrees on War Horror

The President said that, from his observation, the one thing which Khrushchev agreed with Americans—and very sincerely—was the horror of a great war. Eisenhower said, however, that even in agreement with the obvious truth of the futility of committing mutual suicide, there was still room between governments for miscalculation and misunderstanding that could be very serious.

The President expressed doubt that the tiny sphere bearing the Russian national coat of arms ever reached the surface of the moon during the successful trip of the recent Russian Lunik. Eisenhower said he thought that with the speed of the rocket being so high, the sphere probably was vaporized before it could reach the moon.

He called the refusal of Congress to adopt his recommendations for financing the federal debt one of the most serious things that had happened to the United States in his time. He said something would have to be done to put the heat of truth under Congress in order to pass the legislation needed to lift the ceiling on the interest paid on long term government securities.

Eisenhower said he was still firmly committed to free bargaining in settlement of the steel strike and would like to see management and labor tackle the basic issues with-

Allan Eames Being Transferred in Bank

Coos Bay—Transfer of managers of local branches of the First National Bank of Oregon were reported this week. Allan Eames, manager of the Coos Bay branch and former assistant manager of the Medford branch, is being transferred to Portland where he will serve as a district credit manager.

The North Bend branch manager, Sidney Fox, will be transferred to the position of manager of the Coos Bay branch. Charles Packer, now stationed at the Grants Pass branch, will become North Bend manager. The changes will be effective Oct. 1.

out setting up a fact finding board or quarreling over whether the Taft-Hartley Law should be invoked.

He thought the public reception of Khrushchev in Washington was properly restrained because Americans naturally continue to ask themselves serious questions about the policies of the Soviet Union.

Khrushchev Hears Plain Speaking by Mayor of New York

The Premier stopped only briefly at the Waldorf and then drove through more crowds to the Commodore Hotel.

There Mayor Robert F. Wagner, his host, gave Khrushchev a welcome but also a taste of some plain speaking.

Wagner painted a picture of New York built by immigrants from troubled Europe, seeking and finding liberty and the opportunity for a decent living.

Recalls Aid to Russia
"They have given to our nation a full measure of loyalty and devotion, in time of peace and in time of war," Wagner said.

"No foreign ideologies have ever menaced its peaceful welfare, and in time of war—three times in my lifetime—its citizens have gone to fight abroad for the things they believed in, to battle against aggression close at hand, or far off . . ."

Wagner recalled how America had aided Russia in World War II.

"Chairman Khrushchev will undoubtedly recall how the great pipeline of lend-lease started flowing even before our own nation was under attack, and how $11 billion of it was channeled to Russia alone over a five year period," he said.

Greets Workers
Khrushchev made a brief speech at Pennsylvania Station after he was greeted by Richard C. Patterson Jr., commissioner of commerce and public events.

"I am aware that the city of New York is the foremost industrial center of the United States," he said.

"As a former worker, I extend particular greetings to the toilers who create the wealth of society."

After meeting Patterson, Khrushchev was introduced to other city officials and greeted Russian members of the United Nations there to meet him.

Police kept pickets, Hungarians and others, a block away from any spot Khrushchev passed.

The crowds appeared more curious than anything else and many were disappointed or angry because of the speed at which the closed car moved.

Before leaving Washington, Khrushchev met with members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It was the only congressional contact scheduled during his visit. Among those present were two prominently mentioned Democratic presidential possibilities—Senators Lyndon Johnson of Texas and John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

"Keep Our Powder Dry"
"I think it's very important that we maintain our strength and keep our powder dry," Johnson said after the meeting. "I heard nothing to indicate that peace is around the corner."

But Khrushchev was far more optimistic Wednesday night at a Soviet embassy dinner in honor of President Eisenhower. Toasting Eisenhower in champagne, he said "the ice of the cold war has not only already shown signs of a crack, but has started to crumble."

Khrushchev Demonstrates Mastery of Give-and-Take

By HENRY SHAPIRO
UPI Correspondent

Washington—(UPI)—Nikita Khrushchev has demonstrated once again that he is a master of verbal give-and-take—particularly when it comes to defending his political beliefs.

At his appearance at the National Press Club Wednesday, the Soviet premier skillfully parried what he described as "provocative" questions, and used others as a springboard for long restatements of Communist ideology.

Khrushchev, who came here with the avowed intention of melting the ice of the cold war, bore down hardest on a basic article of Communist faith—the inevitable universal triumph of Communism.

The audience—whom Khrushchev once in a slip of the tongue addressed as "comrades"—consisted mostly of distinguished reporters often described in Communist jargon as "lackeys of the bourgeoisie."

"Capitalism To Die"
They were told firmly but politely, in answer to a question, that history foreshadows the inevitable death of capitalism, to be replaced by the "more progressive" Communist order.

With equal emphasis Khrushchev explained away the statement he once made to Western ambassadors that "we shall bury you" by saying he had not intended to assume the role of the "grave digger of capitalism."

Khrushchev's remarks on capitalism followed a familiar pattern. Had he known Shakespeare as well as he knows Russian folklore, he might have been tempted to paraphrase Mark Antony's oft-quoted "I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him" in this way: "I did not come here to praise you or bury you but only to announce your doom."

The speech itself was one of the premier's most moderate utterances. It was an essay on the need for improving Soviet-American relations and settling global problems. It was conspicuously devoid of threats, recrimination and verbal bricks.

It was under questioning by reporters that Khrushchev waxed foxy, eloquent and witty. Some of the questions—those dealing with Hungary, the status of Jesus in the Soviet Union, and Khrushchev's personal role in the Stalinist tyranny—might have embarassed a more conventional Communist.

But not Khrushchev. For a man who is by reputation hot-headed, impetuous and unpredictable, he proved to be a master of restraint. "I will not be provoked by any questions," he said, "or do anything which would hinder the improvement of our relations."
