

Swallow of Live Vaccine Protects Against Polio

London—(Science Service)—One simple swallow of cherry-flavored syrup will give adequate protection against all three types of polio virus, seven American researchers reported here.

The syrup contains types I, II, and III polio viruses that are very much alive. They are, however, too weak to cause paralyzing polio—they merely cause antibodies to be formed in the body.

The researchers are from the viral and rickettsial research section of Lederle Laboratories, Pearl River, N.Y. They reported the results of feeding the oral vaccine to 550 persons, mainly employees of the New York laboratory.

Good Responses
Tests before and after the persons swallowed the vaccine showed that good neutralizing antibody responses were formed in the 241 persons carefully checked. The remaining persons have not yet been checked.

The report appears in the current British Medical Journal. Since the introduction of numerous reports on the live virus vaccine, English health officials now appear to be moving favorable toward the live vaccine than they were a few months ago. They are studying, however, further U.S. trials with the vaccine before starting an experimental program in Great Britain.

Presently, only the Salk vaccine, made of killed viruses, is now backed by the health departments of both the U.S. and Great Britain. Persons must have three separate injections of Salk vaccine to receive immunization against the three types of polio virus.

Goats Given Vaccinated
Currently, the Lederle scientists have finished vaccinating 250,000 Costa Ricans with the tri-valent vaccine. They are now undertaking to vaccinate an additional 250,000. Results reported show that the vaccine is immunizing satisfactorily.

The scientists are Drs. Herald R. Cox, Floyd S. Markham, Arden W. Moyer, Victor J. Cabasso, Max J. Moses, Manuel Roca-Garcia, and James M. Rueggesser.
