

Space Agency Reveals Plan for Moon Exploration

Langley Field, Va. — (UPI) — The government space agency has revealed details of a space flight project that it hopes will put two Americans on the moon's surface in six or eight years.

The men would ride in a three-ton space capsule "containing their life support system." They would make the trip in about 2½ days and stay on the moon about 12 days conducting scientific experiments.

The flight, now only in the theoretical stage, would be made by combining a series of rockets, the first of which is being developed by the Rocketdyne Division of North American Aviation.

Four-Five Years Needed

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration announced last Jan. 9 that it had awarded a $102 million contract to North American for development of a rocket with 1,500,000 pounds of thrust.

NASA said Tuesday "it will take four or five years to complete development of a 1,500,000 pound thrust engine."

"The construction of a vehicle employing these engines in cluster is expected to take another two or three years," it said. "For a manned lunar expedition and return, a five or six stage vehicle would be used."
