

Hypnosis Grows Less Popular Due To Misuse, Abuse

Washington (Science Service) — Hypnosis is becoming less popular as a medical tool, a Canadian researcher said here.

Its unpopularity is due to the abuse and misuse of hypnosis by novices, Dr. Bernard B. Raginsky of Montreal, president of the special panel on clinical hypnosis of the Pan American Medical Association, told Science Service. Members of the Association are here to inform President Eisenhower of their 35th anniversary meeting in Mexico City on May 2-11, 1960. Hypnosis is used much more in the U.S. and in South American countries than in Canada, he explained. But many doctors who want to learn hypnosis do not want to learn the psychological aspects of its use.

Popular in Dentistry

However, it is very popular for childbirth and also certain phases of dentistry. It is a helpful tool when the doctor wants to reduce the patient's anxiety. This is particularly true in dentistry.

Also, hypnosis can be useful to the surgeon who wishes to keep the patient absolutely still or prevent him from coughing, Dr. Raginsky said. The novice, however, wants to use hypnosis in every case, he said, often where it does not apply.

It can also be an effective tool where ordinary psychotherapy does not work. For instance, many times a patient is hiding something from himself, the Montreal scientist said. An example would be the pilot who does not want to admit that he caused a crash. This can be drawn out of a patient with the aid of hypnosis.

Soldier Induced

Contrary to some reports, a person will do things under hypnosis that he would not do ordinarily, Dr. Raginsky said. The researcher then told how, during World War II, he induced a soldier, while under hypnosis, to attack his commanding officer.

"He almost slit the officer's throat, because I had convinced him that the officer was a Japanese soldier," he said. Delving into the field of space medicine, Dr. Raginsky said it had been suggested that the seven astronauts be put under hypnosis for their space flights. Hypnosis will reduce the spacemen's metabolism without reducing their mental powers. The Russians are preparing their astronauts for space flight by Pavlovian conditioning, he said.
