

Urgency of Control No Longer Exists, Planners Are Told

(Continued from Page 1) Lowry also called the ordinance a "shotgun approach to a specific problem" and said he understood the urgency of excavation control no longer existed since awards of new freeway contracts were being deferred for some time.

"This is like running over an ant with a truck," James said in echoing Lowry's opinion that the ordinance covered so much else besides excavation control. James said he favored zoning restrictions but did not consider this ordinance to be the proper instrument.

Bolt agreed that the ordinance would be "unwieldy," and said it was possibly the result of insufficient study and preparation.

Duggan said he doubted if the county court would pass the ordinance in any case. He was critical of the proposal for a board of adjustment which would handle the granting of variances.

"All we have to do is make one mistake," Duggan said, "and when the people vote (on permanent zoning) they'll throw it right back at us."

On the other hand, Latham pointed out, the ordinance provided greater flexibility than Medford's zoning ordinance, for example. He indicated he considered this preferable to being overly specific in the ordinance provisions.

Boyer, a strong advocate of the ordinance, agreed that this flexibility was a virtue.

The only way to get assurances from freeway contractors that they would not carry out harmful excavation work would be to pass the ordinance so they would have to come to the courthouse and ask for variances, Boyer contended. "The contracts for this fill dirt are being let all the time," he said.

If the commission waited for the people to come before it to ask zoning measures, Boyer said, "immeasurable harm is done before they come."

Boyer admitted the ordinance would pose administrative problems. But, he said, the commission would have to meet such problems sooner or later. He said he was confident the ordinance would not present a "major obstacle" and that the commission could solve the problems as they appeared.

Submitted to Voters

Boyer agreed that zoning should be submitted to the voters eventually, "but not initially."

Bolt and Lovejoy were in agreement that the borrow-pit excavations already existing north of Central Point were not as unsightly as they had been made out to be, and that they might prove to have value for recreational development if, as Lovejoy said, "proper thought were given to them."

In other action last night, the planners approved conveying to the county court the information that a requested wrecking yard location on Crater Lake highway would not interfere with tentative plans for county zoning. Approval was voted by Latham, James, Boyer and Duggan with Lowry, Bolt and Lovejoy abstaining.

William Duhaime, attorney representing Wylie, Nelson and Lewis Baker - three brothers who would conduct the operation - spoke in favor of the location, while Bud Hoover spoke against it.

The planners had no formal jurisdiction in the matter, but were simply fulfilling the county court's request that they state how the establishment would fit into the county land use picture.
