

Queen Makes Plans For Arrival of Third Child

(In the following dispatch, Margaret Saville, noted reporter on the British royal family, provides the first details of how Queen Elizabeth II is making ready for her third child.)

London—Plans for the arrival of a baby in any family create excitement. And it's no different in Buckingham Palace, where there is a flurry of preparation for the arrival of Queen Elizabeth's third child, expected in January.

Elizabeth, in a recent stay in Buckingham, decided on a big, airy, third-floor room as a good location for the nursery. This floor is where the Prince of Wales and Princess Anne have their rooms.

The nursery overlooks the palace gardens, Constitution Hill and St. James' park with a view of the daily changing of the guard from one of the front windows.

The royal infant's room will be quite simply decorated in pastel colors, and the same furniture used for the Queen's other two children will come out of storage to be used again. The pieces include a small applewood table with two chairs to match, a large bow-fronted chest painted white (in which all the baby's clothes and accessories can be kept), some comfortable ohintz-covered chairs, and a small, low, nursing chair.

Use Same Cradle
Queen Elizabeth very likely will use the same cradle used twice before. On each previous occasion it was trimmed with frilled white muslin over silk and decorated with ribbon in the Queen's favorite shade of primrose yellow. Such trimming will make it suitable for either a boy or a girl," as Elizabeth has said before.

Elizabeth's intimate friends report she and Prince Philip will welcome either a boy or girl. But other members of the royal family are said to feel that a boy would make them happiest.

The royal sentiment, taking the long view, is that when the new prince grew up he would be able to share the many official duties which require a man's attention. Without a brother Prince Charles is going to have an exceedingly busy life.

When it comes to the layette for the new baby, the Queen will almost certainly use many of the tiny garments which served Princess Anne and her brother. The garments, 11 years old now, all have been carefully preserved and are in excellent condition. The beautifully hand-stitched frocks and gowns were made by residents of the Linen and Woolen Drapers Society Homes for the Aged.

Exquisitely knitted garments were given the queen in her earlier maternities by members of the Nursery Nurses association, the club to which the "Nannies" of Britain's aristocratic and wealthy children all belong. The nannies probably will be making another set or two for the new baby. All the clothes are in white. The Queen prefers white until the children are a year old and both of hers followed this royal tradition.

First-of-the-season Jonathans from Washington's mineral-rich apple valleys, are a "natural toothbrush" to include in lunch boxes. The firm pulp massages gums as it cleans the teeth, and the fruit acids help neutralize the mouth.

Mrs. May Brown, one of two tea hostesses for The Mail Tribune's annual reporters' school and tea Wednesday afternoon at the Red Cross building is pictured serving Mrs. Ray Casterline. Mrs. Casterline was one of four women honored during the school for turning in particularly good copy during the past year. Mrs. Casterline served as publicity chairman for the annual benefit tea last spring of the Medford unit of the American Cancer society. Mrs. Brown is employed in the classified advertising department of The Tribune.
