

No Early Unification in Korea Bet of U.S. Policy Planners

Washington - (UPI) - American policy planners are placing their bets on the belief that there will be no war and no unification in Korea for a long, long time.

No one in high position here is ready to say this publicly. And the idea has not been translated fully into policy. But this is, nevertheless, the thinking of the experts.

Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev's statement on Korea in his Oct. 31 speech to the Supreme Soviet could be interpreted to mean that Moscow has reached the same conclusion.

U.S. officials are so sure the Communists don't want to risk this that they have stopped pressing Peking and Pyongyang to spell out their vague proposals.

Nor is any serious thought being given to bowing to the Communists' troop-withdrawal demand in the event that they should offer to accept a United Nations - supervised creation of a truly representative, unified government. That prospect appears too remote to make it worthwhile to even study the possibility of a concession on the troop-withdrawal issue, in the view of officials here.

Khrushchev's speech to the Supreme Soviet was seen here as evidence that he has nothing new to offer on Korean unification and realizes that his terms will not be accepted in the near future.

He dismissed the possibility of a U.S. or South Korean-instigated war and at the same time laid down the no-war line to his Korean allies.

In a statement similar to his no-force preaching of a month earlier in Peking, Khrushchev said: "In that corner of the world, too, the balance of power is not in favor of those who like to solve ideological questions by means of war or by any other unpeaceful means."

The U.S. state and defense departments are not accepting Khrushchev's word alone as assurance that Communist North Korea will never renege on the war. But they do believe Khrushchev is a realist, that he can control North Korea's moves, and that he knows such an attack would touch off a nuclear war which could easily explode into World War III.

President Eisenhower is convinced that, for the present at least, Khrushchev doesn't want a big war.

The prospect seen here, therefore, is a continued armed truce in divided Korea, with a gradual political adjustment to this reality.

One result of this adjustment may be the negotiation of a more permanent agreement governing the status, rights and obligations of U.S. and other U.N. forces in Korea.

Nixon Thinks Issues on His Side During Fight for Republican Presidential Choice

Editor's note: This is the last in a series on Vice-President Richard M. Nixon's thinking about the 1960 presidential race. The following highlights Nixon's views of the probable issues.

By WILLIAM THEIS
Washington - (UPI) - Vice President Richard M. Nixon thinks the issues are on his side if there's a battle for the Republican presidential nomination next year.

That's the word from the Nixon camp as evidence mounts that New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller is bidding for top place on the 1960 GOP ticket.

"We think Rockefeller will have trouble finding an issue," one Republican very close to Nixon said. "He can take a position on nuclear tests, as he did recently, and he can talk about outer space. But in the final analysis, he'll have to run on the Eisenhower administration record."

The Vice President will be running on that record - and can underscore the fact that he had a hand in writing it.

Nixon backers predict that President Eisenhower will have a "tremendous moral influence" on the outcome of the 1960 contest. They do not expect him to indicate a personal choice to the Republican Convention at Chicago.

But they believe he will be "more enthusiastic about some one who supports his policies."

Fighting for the Administration's legislative program, while making increasingly clear his own views, will be a primary Nixon objective in early 1960. He has his eye on the election, he tells friends, and thinks it could be "won or lost" in the first six months of next year.

From the standpoint of issues, the vice-president has carried the ball repeatedly for the Eisenhower administration. He has spoken out on foreign aid and school improvement, risked political fire by advocating top-bracket tax cuts, and has warned against cutting overseas economic spending. He was the first in 1958 to advocate a five-year extension of the reciprocal trade program - a sensitive subject on Capitol Hill.

Congress surprised even itself by voting for a four-year extension, more than the administration originally expected.

And when Russia launched its first Sputnik in 1957, Nixon refused to join those administration officials who belittled the feat. Instead, he called for a step-up in American effort and urged the country to stop "wailing" and get to work.

Where does Nixon think all this leaves Rockefeller - or any other convention opponent?

Obviously, Nixon associates reply, Rockefeller has to make a case that he'd be a "better president." They look for a "charm" drive by the New Yorker, coupled with citations of his government service in Washington and his record to date as a state administrator.

If the governor personally makes use of the "Nixon can't win" theme, as some Rockefeller supporters have started doing, look for fireworks.

Nixon has never seen a parallel between his situation and that of the Eisenhower

Robert A. Taft contest in 1952, when the "can't win" argument beat the late senator from Ohio in the convention.

The charge that Nixon could not attract the Democratic or independent votes which the Republicans need to win the White House is admittedly Nixon's toughest hurdle.

Cranberries Buried At Albany Dump

Albany - (UPI) - A million pounds of cranberries were buried by bulldozers at the city dump here a month ago, it was learned Tuesday night.

Officials for the Albany Ice and Cold Storage Co., said the berries were buried because they might have contained cancer causing residue from a weed-killing chemical spray. They were from the 1957 crop.

Officials said the berries were buried after being prepared and frozen because they showed yellow spots which indicated presence of the chemical.

An estimated two million more pounds from the 1959 crop were being held up here after arriving for storage.
