Bright Headlights Can Be Dangerous

If a policeman is patrolling a beat on a dark night and hears a suspicious noise, in self-defense he snaps his flashlight toward the sound to blind momentarily anyone lurking there. This way the patrolman can see who is there and can move in on him before he can react.

Medford Chief of Police Charles P. Champlin said he teaches this technique of blinding to police recruits. He warned, however, that while this technique is helpful in this instance, there are times when a blinding light can prove disastrous, especially on the highway.

A dangerous momentary blinding effect may result when a motorist fails to dim his lights when approaching or following another driver. Champlin said: "In this case, it is not a technique of self-defense, but rather, failure to show courtesy and respect toward another driver. It may cause him to lose control of his car."

The Oregon law specifically requires a driver to dim his lights 500 feet before meeting oncoming traffic. He must dim when following within 350 feet behind a car. Lights on high beams shining in the eyes of an oncoming motorist can be dangerous. This is true even on a divided highway. Often as dangerous is the follower whose high beam lights reflect off the rear view mirror of the car ahead into its driver's eyes blinding him.

The Institute reported, with deaths and illnesses reaching their lowest point. Then, the death rate gets progressively worse until it reaches its peak in March.
