Car Crash Study Slated in State

Salem - (UPI) - Beginning Dec. 1, a special study will be conducted to determine the nature and causes of injuries incurred in late-model car accidents in 12 Oregon counties.

State police, the State Medical Society, Oregon Board of Health, hospitals and the automotive crash injury research program of Cornell university will carry out the study.

Counties involved are Deschutes, Crook, Jefferson, Wasco, Hood River, Josephine, Coos, Douglas, Lane, Yamhill, Tillamook and Clatsop.

The research will cover only accidents in rural areas. Data produced in earlier studies, according to the Oregon Traffic Safety commission, have indicated the degree of protection offered by such safety features as improved door locks, energy-absorbing steering wheels, seat belts and padded dashboards.

Hi-Lites
 IN THE History OF Pharmacy
 by Jim Foster

The continued use of some drugs called obsolete by new theories of medicine by the common people helped to preserve the knowledge of these drugs that sometimes became useful later as medical knowledge progressed.

One of the best examples of this is Cod Liver Oil. It first appeared in the 15th century to be used on wounds. In 1730 Norwegian fishermen and farmers found that it would cure rickets. In 1770 the English used it in the treatment of rheumatism. In 1837 it was discovered that there was iodine in cod liver oil and this was thought to be the reason for its value. Not until the discovery of vitamins was its true worth understood.
