Over $1 Billion Spent Annually On Teeth Care

Cambridge, Mass. — (UPI) — Americans spend more than a billion dollars caring for their teeth, but only a fraction of that in research to prevent tooth decay and mouth ailments, a Harvard professor said recently.

Dr. Sognnaes, F. Sognnaes, writing in the current issue of Science magazine on the first 100 years of dentistry as a profession, said, "We have seen as much progress as one could ask for in return for our limited investment in dental science."

Dr. Sognnaes, in his article, "Dentistry at the Crossroads," reported Americans spend $1.6 billion annually on dental care — about one sixth of the nation's total expenditure on health.

Small Percentage
But, he said, only a small percentage of the money is invested in basic dental research.

He said most of the nation's 47 dental schools were in a position to conduct research but were financially limited. Dr. Sognnaes, acting dean of the Harvard School of Dental Medicine, said the total endowment of the 27 privately supported dental schools was less than ten million dollars.

Program Outlined
Looking ahead to the next century, Dr. Sognnaes outlined a three pronged attack against dental diseases which included federal support for training dental researchers; long-term research for dental scientists; and collaboration with research scientists in other fields.

"Ultimately," Dr. Sognnaes said, "this three pronged approach will elevate the whole trend of teaching, research and service for dental health."

Leukemia Virus in Mice Isolated

London — (Science Service) — A virus has been isolated from a mouse with leukemia that will produce different tumors in mice and hamsters.

When young mice, rats and hamsters were inoculated, the virus produced heart, lung and kidney sarcomas, and mammary tumors as well as lesions, a team of British scientists reports here in the British Medical Journal.

The virus, which is now being studied by electron microscopy, is similar to one isolated earlier by other researchers, report Drs. G. Neroni, R. Dourmashkin and F. C. Chesterman of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund.

Although cell-free extracts of hamster tumors are apparently not infective for newborn or adult hamsters, some virus must be present in these tumors. The researchers explain that these extracts injure mouse embryo cells, and cell-free cultures from these embryo cells will again produce bloody lesions and tumors in hamsters.

The researchers are attempting to relate infectivity of the cultures with the number and type of particles seen in an electron microscope.

U.S. Cows Content, But Also Hungry

Ithaca, N.Y. — (Science Service) — America's cows may be contented, but they are also hungry, researchers at the New York State College of Engineering, Cornell University here, believe.

Profs. J. K. Loosli and R. G. Warner have found that the average cow will produce up to five pounds more milk a day if her daily menu includes 20 pounds of good grain. Most dairymen give their cows less than 15 pounds a day.

Many cows brought to the university in average condition, the scientists report, give 1,000 to 3,000 pounds more milk a year when their feed is increased.

Bum Check Artist Was Good Painter

Keene, N.H. — The hot check artist who clipped a merchant here was really an artist.

A Keene grocer sold cold cuts to a man who handed him a check which had apparently been stamped with a check protector machine.

A closer and too late look showed the red and black printing of the firm's name and the stamped amount of the check, were drawn in by an artistic hand.

The artist also painstakingly produced, with a pin, the tiny holes with which a check protector machine pierces a check.
