See the Spring Bride

Serge Matta's bride (above) looks like a Spanish infanta in widely puffed veiling. The top is a jacket hiding gold beading.

From the house of Carven (below) comes an exquisitely simple design in nylon lace. Its train is one of the longest in Paris.

FROM PARIS, a city whose way of life is devoted to elegance and romance, comes this exclusive preview of what the spring bride will wear. Each gown has the kind of individuality that has come to be identified with the French touch of designing genius.

Sleeves vary in width, skirts vary in shape, but all have a graceful silhouette in common. Though traditional in length, the train has gone and in its place are yards of delicate veiling that surround the bride's tresses like a cloud. Materials are chosen for their regal look and whisper weight. Summed up: these are once-in-a-lifetime gowns for a once-in-a-lifetime occasion.
