

Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

Without Shell, a Mussel Is Merely a Muscle

Without the protecting shell a muscle is little more than a muscle. It has an almond shaped body, and can neither see, hear, nor smell. Its nervous system consists of three pairs of ganglia, situated in the "foot," in the undeveloped "heat" and in the very real digestive tract.

The creature has no brain or spinal column, but it does have a certain amount of "gray matter" outside of where the brain ought to be. That is in the ganglion, where nervous impulses sluggishly act to put the bivalve in motion.

This mollusk is found in both fresh and salt water. When the land began to emerge from an ancient ocean many eons ago, some of the mussels were marooned. They adjusted themselves to the fresh water and have remained there ever since. Over the thousands of years of elapsed time they have branched off into many species. They still get by beautifully with a mouth, but no jaws or saliva glands, and an undeveloped "head."

Protect Body
The two shells that protect the soft body meet all the way around, fitting closely together. A section of the body fold along the back remains always soft, acting as a hinge for the two valves. This hinge is elastic tissue. Compressed so that the tendency of the two shells is to remain open all the time, but held together by a special muscle. If the mollusk itself is killed, the empty shell always will be agape, the elastic hinge snapping the two valves apart when death comes to the owner.

When alive, the mussel projects a wedge-shaped section of the body fold, called a "foot," from the shell which acts as a pulling lever as the bivalve plows along in the mud or sand. It is a very slow and deliberate pace — even slower than the so-called "snail's pace." But the mussel is never in a hurry. It really isn't going anywhere.

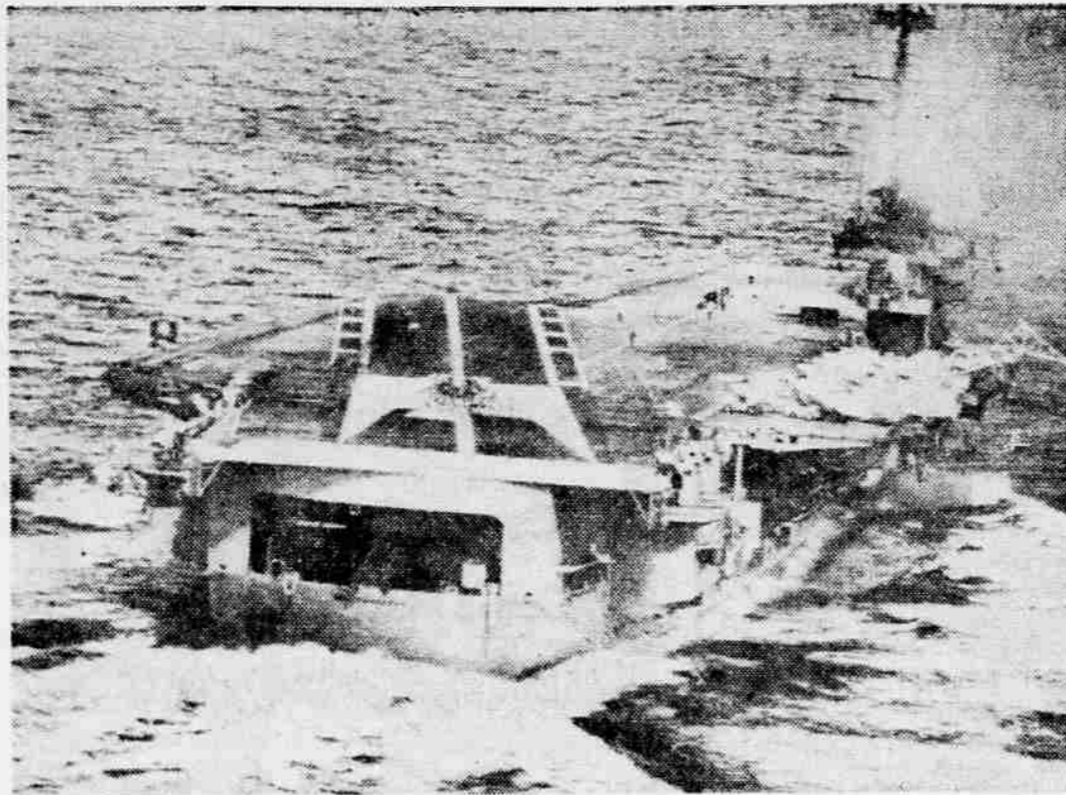

In the fall of the year, as the water cools, this common mollusk unconsciously performs a peculiar performance, an action which scientists cannot explain or understand. It compresses a store of food into a crystalline substance that will be retained in the stomach as a reserve supply for the winter months.

During the fall, too, eggs are ejected which are later conveyed to the gills and carried until they develop into tiny larvae. Each larva is equipped with small hooks which will serve as holding hooks when the little creature is ready for the next step of its development.

When a small fish passes, the larvae attempt, and usually succeed, in hooking onto the fins or gills of the fish. The irritation sets up an action in the chemistry of the fish, which builds around the point of attachment a section of "scar tissue." This protects the small mollusk until it is ready to let loose and fall into the mud of the pond or ocean bottom.

Unwillingly, the fish plays an important part in the life of the mollusk, keeping it from being carried away by river currents or wave action as well as some protection from predators.

LANDING — The meatball in the mirror (extreme left of flight deck) tells oncoming pilot he's in good shape on his pass at the USS Independence off the coast of Norfolk, Va. The generous stretch of deck is equivalent to 10 times its length in terms of the land-based variety. Handling and emergency personnel stand ready to render an immediate assist. The angled deck has brought new efficiency to aircraft carrier operations and increased safety. (UPI Telephoto)

Business Education Subject of Meeting

The business education program at Medford High school will be reviewed at the monthly curriculum presentation to the school board and interested lay people at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday, Feb. 2, at Medford High school.

Representatives of local business firms have been invited to the presentation, school officials said. The presentation will be made by Louis Mahar, head of the business education department; Carl Bergman, typing instructor; Hedrick Junior High; Miss Josephine Culbertson; Miss Gertrude Frederickson, and Mrs. Freda Potter, of the high school business education department; and John Crabb, director of the distributive education program.

The session will be presented in the classrooms of the business education department in the southeast corner of the second floor at the high school, officials said. Student guides will be at entrances to direct people to the classrooms involved.
