Du Pont Article Traces Factors Leading To Decline in Bonds

By ELMER C. WALZER
UPI Financial Editor

New York–(UPI)–In the ordinary course of things economic, bonds tend to decline when money rates rise, and rise when money eases.

Elmer Walzer

That rule hasn't changed, but the prospect of a cut in interest rates of a size sufficiently large to do the trick of raising bond prices is in doubt.

Edmund Du Pont, senior partner of the New York Stock Exchange firm of Francis I. duPont & Co., brings out that situation in the leading article in the firm's new monthly publication "Investor-news."

Writing on the subject: "Tight money and the dollar: A dilemma," Du Pont traces the various factors leading up to the decline in bonds, and notes:

"Up until recently, it has been customary to assume that bond prices would drop during periods when the Federal Reserve was keeping a tight rein on credit, but that the losses would be recovered later when the banking authorities found it once again advisable to make money easy.

"Now, however, doubts have arisen that this is necessarily true."

U.S. Losing Gold

These doubts, Du Pont says, are inspired by the shift of international payments against the United States, resulting in a continuing loss of gold.

Here is how it works: Foreigners build up dollar balances which if directed through their governments could make even greater inroads into our gold supply.

The way to stem this gold outflow is to make investment in our securities alluring enough through higher rates of interest. These higher returns will divert investment from the gold hoard to our securities.

Now it appears the Federal Reserve has a bear by the tail and it can't let go. Here is how Du Pont puts it:

"Our present scale of interest rates is proving at least partly successful in coaxing foreign balances to stay put. But that raises a companion problem.

"However optimistic we may be about business prospects for 1960, we must expect a business letdown sometime in the future. When that recession comes, the Federal Reserve ordinarily would be expected to move quickly to make money more plentiful. Interest rates in turn, would come down.

Treasury Defending Dollar

"However, with the Federal Reserve helping the Treasury defend the dollar, easing credit may prove impractical.

"To ease money and lower interest rates – especially if interest rates were high abroad – would encourage money to flow out of the United States for investment elsewhere.

"In short, the gold drain would be renewed and would be quite impossible to stop without impeding business recovery at home."

Du Pont concludes his article with a suggestion that the believers in the so-called modern economics think through once again the answer to the question: "Are you quite sure that we have tamed the business cycle?"

The new Du Pont "Investornews" is a 24-page booklet about the size of the stock exchange's monthly publication, "The Exchange."

Back in 1929, the cry was that investors were improperly informed. That can't be said today. Just now the investor can accumulate top-notch information on almost any corporation or market subject – and most of the publications are free.

Wall Street Chatter

New York – (UPI) – Has the bull market ended?

Hayden, Stone & Co. thinks not.

"Apparently," it points out, "there are quite a few who believe so and there is more cautiousness and real pessimism now than there has been for some time."

At present there are no real signs of a big decline in business, the firm adds, "and the only thing that is very worrisome is that a declining stock market more often than not influences future business and consumer decisions adversely and brings on a recession."

The firm says a lot depends on how soon and in what area the market is able to reform a new base of support and especially how it performs on any rally from its recently oversold position.

Inside Wall Street, publication of Investor's Union Inc., notes that Deere & Co. is available at six times earnings, and that Dynex, an exciting though extremely risky issue, is in midst of mergers that could conceivably double its earning power.

Lucien O. Hooper of W. E. Hutton & Co. says "we have not had a clear cut selling climax with high volume, a late tape, and a heavy preponderance of declines over advances; and perhaps we won't have one right now."

Ex-Rogue River Man Dies in Plane Crash

Rogue River – Maj. Ray R. St. John of Yorba Linda, Calif., a graduate of Rogue River High school, was killed last week when his plane crashed off Cherry Point, N. C., according to word received here.

He was returning from a routine flight and was circling the Cherry Point airstrip when the plane disappeared from the radar scope. An all night search failed to turn up a trace of the flier or his aircraft, according to reports.

The Marine Corps pilot is survived by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Roscoe St. John; two brothers, a sister, his widow and three children who live in Santa Ana, Calif.

His wife is the former Marie Jones, who attended Rogue River schools.

LOOK BEFORE LEAP

Memphis, Tenn. –(UPI)– Ronald Gibson, 7, had some second thoughts today about the 12-foot jump he made from the top of a backyard shed while playing Superman.

"Next time I'll get me a cape," he said. "But I'll pick me a spot where I'll land in some water."
