What's the use of struggling to Hollywood stardom if you can't look down on the world? So Carolyn Jones built a home with a view.

Husband Aaron Spelling, a top writer-producer, watches a new fur enter the family and recalls leaner times of only yesterday.

IF HOLLYWOOD wants to regain some of its faded glamour, maybe it should try keeping up with Jones—Carolyn Jones, in this case.

A couple of years ago, Carolyn and her husband, writer-producer Aaron Spelling, couldn't make the down payment on a one-bedroom home which would have fit into Rudolph Valentino's sitting room in "the good old days" when film stars awed the world with their lavish living.

Success eventually came to Aaron and Carolyn, now appearing in Warner Brothers' "Ice Palace," and they determined to make up for old frustrations and splurge like the idols of yesteryear.

The result is a sprawling $150,000 home in fashionable Royal Oaks with enough wall-to-wall carpeting to put a rug dealer in business, plus wading-pool-size bathtubs (with gilt hardware), a chauffeured Cadillac, a closetful of furs and cashmeres, and a view looking down on—Hollywood's favorite angle—such neighbors as Steve Allen, Julie London, Shirley MacLaine, and Gale Storm.

It doesn't compare with Valentino's fabled "Falcon's Lair"—but he didn't have Uncle Sam nesting with him as today's stars do.

Carolyn likes life's simple things as long as they're luxurious like this new living room.
