

Russians Stress Faith in Science, Attache Believes

Ardsley-on-Hudson, N.Y. — (Science Service) — "The Soviet citizen, government and Nikita Khrushchev have more faith in science and technology than in Marxism," Dr. John Turkevich, who will serve this summer as acting U.S. scientific attache to the USSR, believes.

This change of faith may hold a key to peace, he said. The Princeton University chemist spoke at a seminar for science writers here, sponsored by the National Science Foundation.

He said the Soviet people do not tell visitors the USSR will better the U.S. because Communist philosophy but because of scientific advances.

"Thank God for that," Dr. Turkevich said.

Great Wave of Respect

Dr. Turkevich's father, an immigrant from Russia, is an American archbishop of the Russian Orthodox church.

The chemist said the USSR's proletariat revolution did not liquidate the intellectual influence. In fact, today the scientist is riding a great wave of respect, Dr. Turkevich said.

Scientists foster East-West exchanges that may aid peace, he said, while blind faith in Communist ideology prevented Western ideas from getting into the USSR.

Dr. Turkevich estimates he talked to 40,000 people — including Premier Khrushchev — while lecturing at the recent U.S. exposition in Moscow. He speaks Russian fluently.

Affection for Americans

He said he found "tremendous affection and admiration for the people of the United States" among Soviet citizens. "Some of this admiration stems from our scientific and technological advances."

In another session, Dr. Frank Fremont-Smith, medical director of the Josiah Macy Jr. Foundation, said specialists attacking the same problem from different backgrounds benefit from free-wheeling bull sessions.

He said a chemist and a physicist working separately on the same general problem are often antagonistic. One listens with a chip on his shoulder when the other makes a formal presentation at a scientific convention.

The productive exchange of ideas often comes at these conventions only after the formal part is over and the scientists meet in give-and-take discussions.
