

Bulletin Helps Woodland Owners Identify Quality

Corvallis - If you're going to sell or buy timber, it's common sense to know both the quantity and quality of the timber you're talking about.

A new bulletin prepared by the Oregon State college extension service helps woodland owners and timber buyers do that. Titled, "Measuring Trees," the new bulletin uses examples, tables, and illustrations to help readers learn how to measure the potential wood products on timber lands.

To determine the volume of products in a woodland, an inventory or "cruise" must be made. This inventory will show the owner or buyer the volume and quality of saleable products in terms of board feet for saw logs or peeler, in cords for pulpwood or fuelwood, and in pieces for poles, piling and posts.

Then, by knowing the current prices for different sizes and grades of these timber products, the owner can decide which ones to sell to make the most money.

Quantity Quality
Woodland owners need to know the quantity and quality of their timber for best management as well as to make the best selling decisions, the bulletin points out. Timber is a crop, and like other crops will grow better on good land under good management.

The bulletin tells readers how to lay out timber plots, how to measure individual trees and groups of trees, use aerial photographs, and measure cut timber. Tables are included so use can be made of special measuring scales and instruments.

Prepared by Gary H. Sander, extension forest products marketing specialist at OSC, the bulletin was published cooperatively by the extension services of Oregon State college, Washington State university, and University of Idaho.

Oregon residents can obtain a free copy at their county extension office, or from the OSC bulletin clerk, Corvallis.

Tree-Trimmer Takes Quick Way Down

Anaheim, Calif.—Landscape Harold Teitle, 32, finished a tree-trimming job ahead of schedule when he cut through a branch to which he had tied his safety rope.

Down went the branch. Harold and all. He suffered cuts in the 25-foot fall.
