Neighborhood Church Called 'Self-Centered'

By LOUIS CASSELS
United Press International
The typical neighborhood church is "self-centered." It is so preoccupied with its own welfare as an institution that it gives little thought to serving others.

So says a well-known Episcopal layman, who thinks it's time for churches to begin practicing what they preach about unselfishness.

The outspoken layman is Peter Day of Milwaukee, Wis., editor of Living Church magazine.

His indictment of all-episcopal parish churches is contained in a new book, "Saints on Main Street," published by Seabury Press of Greenwich, Conn.

Truth Not Recognized

Day points out, in the words of the New Testament, that Jesus "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life as a ransom for many."

If a parish church is really part of the "body of Christ," it should live by the same standard, he said. But he sees little evidence that this truth is widely recognized.

"This is a great period of prosperity in the life of the parishes," he says. "Most of them are growing according to every index of success. Their membership is on the rise, the Sunday school is bursting at the seams, old debts are being paid off, new ones are easily floated for ambitious new building projects, men and women are active in parish groups, financial contributions are increasing, and people are praying, studying and working harder than ever before."

Using Different Norms
"There is, however, a curiously inverted quality about the entire enterprise. Typically, the parish measures its progress not according to the norms of its service to community and world, but according to the norms of its own size and financial strength. Similarly, it measures the usefulness of its members not by their service to mankind but by their service to the parish itself."

Day believes that he and other laymen are largely to blame for allowing the church to become "introverted." By defaulting on their responsibility to play a major role in church life, laymen have allowed - or compelled - clergymen to run "practically the whole show."

However dedicated a Christian a clergyman may be, Day says, he is conditioned by his training and environment to concentrate on "church work" rather than "the work of the church" in the outside world.
