When Your Child Lies or Steals

In teaching children to respect the property of others, we must be consistently careful to respect their property, remembering that the baby understands "mine" long before "yours."

When Marcia was three, her mother gave a little visitor one of her dolls to take home because Marcia had two alike and "Betty wants it so much." Later, with some logic, Marcia "stole" one of her grandmother's necklaces, "because I wanted it."

We teach children to be reliable and generous by consistent example, not by making them share their treasures. If we force them to do so, we only delay their understanding of property rights.

CHILDREN of five and six usually have learned that it is not acceptable practice to take things that belong to others, but we need to be prepared for a certain amount of backsliding.

When Willy was six, he began taking coins from his mother's purse. He knew it was wrong, but another impulse was stronger, as his parents discovered when they looked for the reason.

They had just moved to a new neighborhood. Willy felt lost without his friends. He was trying to buy the popularity he missed by dispersing candy bought with the stolen funds.

His parents were wise enough not to jump all over him as a thief, which would only have made him feel more isolated. They made it clear why members of a family and other people must be able to trust each other implicitly. Then they discussed his problem and helped him find an answer: he was supplied with cookies to share.

Sometimes the excitement of playing cops and robbers for real prompts older children into a stealing streak. There is a certain thrill in taking a risk.

Teddy, 11, was caught stealing apples from a grocery and was soundly spanked. "If I ever catch you at that again, I'll punish you even more severely," his father warned, not realizing that this threat carried two unfortunate implications.

It put greater emphasis on the "game"—not being caught. It also suggested to the child that his father had no real faith in his future good behavior.

No matter how the case is settled, leave your child with the feeling that the episode is now closed, and that you have complete faith in his ability to learn from it.

FREQUENT STEALING is a serious matter, of course, and if a child persists, his parents are well advised to seek aid from a child-guidance clinic or other professional source. Usually parents can guide a child through such a period if they understand that stealing often is a sign that the youngster feels inadequate in some fashion. A child who is having difficulties at school sometimes will go through a stage of appropriating various objects. A child who feels the need of more attention and affection at home, or who is suffering from a sense of rivalry with a brother or sister will do the same.

We must remember that children are not naturally moral. Honesty, truthfulness, and regard for the rights of others are acquired by trial and error, just as walking is mastered only after tumbles.

We never doubt that the baby will learn to walk and then run. If he falls, we pick him up. It does not occur to us to scold him as "bad" for stumbling.

Older children need the same faith that they will learn to walk in the way of truth and honesty.

Don't put your trust in punishment. Punishment is like medicine, not like food. The normal child needs only minute doses of medicine on rare occasions, but he needs a steady supply of food. Your faith in him, your example, and guidance are the food on which his character will grow strong!

(In an early issue of Family Weekly, Mrs. Gruenberg will discuss another problem of child and parent: those fascinating but perplexing years of emotional growth between 11 and 15.)
