America's 'Vanishing' Indians Claimed Making Comeback

New York, N.Y. - (Scientific American Feature) - Americans of European descent have always believed that the original Americans would somehow vanish. But despite slaughter, assimilation, disease and general maltreatment at the hands of the white man, the Indian is staging a comeback at the rate of about five per cent annually, according to Oliver La Farge, president of the Association on American Indian Affairs.

Despite laws presuming to elevate the Indian to the status of first class citizen, prejudice continues to fight against the original Americans in many parts of the country, according to Dr. La Farge. All became citizens with the enactment of legislation in 1924 in recognition of their services in World War I. But as recently as the second Truman administration Indian policy swung around abruptly, both in the executive branch and in Congress. Once again the Federal trustee set out to diminish the amount of land held by Indians which one major official, speaking of a tribe irritatingly persistent in standing upon its legal rights, said was "a milestone around those Indians' necks."

Not Vanishing
By such treatment and far worse, the Indian population, estimated at 900,000 in 1600 when the white man appeared, had sunk by 1920 to 350,000. Today it stands at some 500,000. The vanishing Indian, in other words, is not vanishing.

"Despite everything," said Dr. La Farge, "the tribes are still here. But, by and large, these citizens are extremely poor. They live in scattered communities, few of which exceed 50,000 and many of which number less than 1,000. Their health is worse than that of any other racial group in the country - the average life-expectancy of the Papago Indians of Arizona, in a most salubrious climate, is 17 years. Yet the Indians and most of their communities are going to continue into the future."

"Present Indian culture could be represented by a parallelogram of forces, in which the current attitudes, emotions and ways of responding to situations are the product of the action upon each other of the aboriginal culture and the culture that the white man has brought or imposed. Deep down, the cultural stream of the Indian runs strong and, it seems, cannot be choked off. In the old days many tribes were contemptuous of the accumulation of property and of individual self-assertion. This pattern still inhibits Indians in competition for jobs and promotion, or in reciting and asking questions in college classrooms. When white advisers have had the sense to work with this trait, instead of fighting it, they find that it leads to strength in community endeavors and progress."

Pushed Around
"One effect of the Indians' historical experience has been a development of frustration, resentment and dependency - qualities that can too often be observed in modern Indians. They have been pushed around for anywhere from one to two centuries; they are de-

Florida Residents To Participate in Live Virus Study

Miami, Fla. - (Science Service) - More than 500,000 residents of Dade county will eventually participate in the live virus polio vaccine program now underway here.

Each participant in this study group, consisting of those under 40 years, will swallow a cherry-colored and flavored tri-valent vaccine developed by Dr. Herald Cox of Lederle Laboratories, Pearl River, N.Y.

Three-in-One Punch
The vaccine, it is hoped will deliver a three-in-one punch. It will trigger each person's body to manufacture antibodies that fight all polio cripples, types I, II and III. Antibody levels of participants have been previously determined from 10,000 random blood samples. The antibody counts of these samples will later be compared with those taken after the program is complete to measure the effect of the vaccine.

Dade County, Fla., which includes Miami, has a longer polio season than most areas in the country, due to its warm weather. Although the incidence of polio has declined in the county through use of the Salk vaccine, that vaccine does not offer the hope of eradicating the disease or preventing its spread through the community.

Shorter Immunity Seen
Salk vaccine, made from killed viruses, is between 70 per cent and 90 per cent effective. Immunity produced by this vaccine is suspected to be shorter than the estimated five to seven years for the live virus vaccine.

The live polio virus vaccine project is sponsored by the Dade County Health Department, the Dade County Medical Association and the University of Miami School of Medicine.

Early this month, more than 7,500 students swallowed the same vaccine in a mass feeding and pre-test at the University. The entire program should be completed by the end of April, although the vaccine will be offered to newborns and new residents on a continuing basis.

Ground Rules Could Thwart Atomic War, Physicist Declares

Chicago - (Science Service) - If Russia and the U.S. could mutually agree on some ground rules covering the use of atomic weapons, it would go a long way toward preventing the chain reaction that could lead to an all-out nuclear war.

Prof. Leo Szilard, physicist at the University of Chicago and one of the men who helped develop the U.S. atom bomb, suggests that the two countries impose restrictions upon themselves. These restrictions must be such that neither country would gain by violating them.

Adequate Philosophy
To reduce chances that some minor disturbance could trigger a major war, Prof. Szilard suggests that Russia and the U.S. first adopt an "adequate philosophy" of what constitutes a permissible threat. This being done, both nations' points of view would shift and both governments would come to look upon allied nations as "potential liabilities." This would follow a political settlement between the two nations aimed at eliminating intervention.

Then a "one for one" principle must be accepted whereby one nation would retaliate against the other by nuclear bombing of a specified city. The city would be named 30 days in advance, to give residents a chance to move out and to enable the government to set up emergency accommodations elsewhere. These nuclear blows would be aimed at property destruction. The other nation would be obliged to strike back at a city, or several cities having the same aggregate population, and under the same conditions of forewarning. Otherwise the war would get out of control and chaos would result.

May Be Possible
Prof. Szilard said such agreements may be possible as the world moves out of the
