Two Together Live Cheaper Than 1 and 1

Corvallis — An unwary bachelor may think he's being trapped by the old saw "two can live cheaper than one," but there's a grain of truth in the statement, say Oregon State college extension food marketing specialists.

What they tell "singletons" and families is that a young married couple can eat for less money per person than two single persons living alone. In other words, the "unit" cost, or per person cost lowers, but the total food bill increases.

A U. S. department of agriculture survey of families in the West shows that the average cost of food for families in the West shows that the average cost of food for families of four persons averaged about $33.10 a week, compared with a grocery bill of $21.40 for a family of two. On this basis, unit cost for one member in the four-member household was $8.28 compared to $10.70 a person in the smaller family.

Regardless of family size, meat, poultry, and fish took by far the largest part of the food dollar—roughly a third—specialists continue. Families with more members spent a larger portion of their food money for milk and dairy products and for flour, cereals and bakery products than smaller families. Large families also spent less for meat, poultry and fish and for fresh fruits and vegetables than the smaller families.

Another reason that "unit" cost per member is less in a large family than in single households is that unmarriages eat out more and are less likely to produce or preserve foods at home.
