THE PRICKLIEST thorn in the hide of Nikita Khrushchev is undoubtedly Allen Welsh Dulles, a tweedy, schoolmasterish gentleman currently residing in Washington, D. C. The reason is that Dulles is an acknowledged champion of the science of stealing state secrets and is probably the world's most efficient master spy.

This pre-eminence is quite an achievement for a man whose father was a Presbyterian preacher and whose childhood training included a three-mile hike to church each Sunday.

As the clearheaded director of our government's Central Intelligence Agency, Dulles makes a daily summary of reports from thousands of clandestine agents on both sides of the Iron Curtain, and this summary is the first document to which President Eisenhower turns with his morning coffee.

Each week, Dulles' briefings of the President and members of the National Security Council provide the information by which our policy-setters work.

In March of 1952, when the story of Stalin's fatal illness broke, Dulles was among the first three persons called to the President's office.

In October, 1956, when England, France, and Israel attacked the Suez Canal, he was one of the first to reach the White House.

Yet the public knows little of Allen Dulles. Though he won his spurs years ago as lawyer, public-spirited citizen, and international-affairs expert, it took the death of his older brother, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, to remove the shadow which obscured his genuine merit.

His assignment for almost a decade has been to discover what our enemies are up to and to anticipate their intentions. This activity comes easily to his law-trained brain. Proof is found in his record during World War II, when he first began to demonstrate his flair for doing the impossible.

For example, our wartime espionage outfit, the Office of Strategic Services, of which he was European director, stole more than 2,400 top-secret documents off the heavily guarded desk of German Foreign Minister Von Ribbentrop himself.

Reports from Dulles' office in Switzerland were the first to call Allied attention to strange concrete structures being built deep in Germany near the Baltic village of Peenemunde. They turned out to be launching pads for Hitler's V-2 rockets.

Months ahead of the event, his messages revealed the decision of a group of German generals to kill Hitler and surrender their armies to the Allies. When their plot failed, although the bomb injured Hitler and killed four others, Dulles managed to save the life of a chief conspirator by sending a forged German passport and a Gestapo identification disk to his secret hiding place in Berlin from which he made his way to safety in Switzerland.

WHETHER such feats are being equalled by the CIA under his leadership today is a closely guarded secret. Our best evidence is the constant Soviet attempt to smear him.

In appearance, Dulles is quite the opposite of the popular concept of a master spy. Various journalists have compared him with a schoolmaster, tycoon, politician, and tennis coach. He is tall and big-boned, with a professor's towering forehead under a thatch of white hair. He wears rimless glasses, has a full, gray mustache, wears rumpled, ready-made tweeds, and bow ties. He is a study in
