Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

Peacocks Were Stopped By a Force That Wasn't There. The peacocks in the enclosure appeared contented. They seemed to have resigned themselves to the unpleasant fact they were imprisoned and accepted it philosophically.

At first some of them slammed themselves into the encircling screen a few times but apparently never figured out they could escape if they would fly straight up, for there was no screen over the top.

Things were fine for a week. Then one bird got an "idea," and his mates followed his example. They would take aim at an invisible spot slightly above the top of the fence, then with a little spring they would launch themselves into the air and sail over, missing the fence top by a safe few inches. It didn't seem economically sound to raise the height of the fence or to cover over the top with screen, so we tried an experiment.

We stretched a very thin wire parallel to the fence top and about eight inches above it. The wire was black in contrast to the silvery color of the fence itself. After the wire was in place we hoped it would keep the birds intact and save the expense of more screen. Strangely enough, this apparently hairbrained idea paid off.

The next time the birds took aim at the top of the fence, directing their flight at the "hunk of air" a few inches above the fence, they slammed into the invisible barrier. The spring of the tail wire threw them back into the enclosure. Ordinarily there is seldom much of an expression on the face of a peacock but with these birds there seemed to be a look of utter bewilderment or surprised disbelief.

They tried the "over-the-fence-stunt" several times. They had the mistaken idea at first, thought what they couldn't see certainly couldn't hurt them but they learned that there may be obstacles over which even a being with wings and determination cannot surmount.

A peacock's brain is only slightly larger than a marble but even with this limited mental equipment they learned. They gave up in disgust. By the end of the first week, not a single bird attempted the fence-vaulting act. By the end of the second week, we humans who seemed to learn much slower than the "bird-brains" decided there was no further use for the tightly strung wire.

Never again did the peacocks attempt the leap. To them the wire they couldn't see anyway, was still there. It remained a "memory block" a mental barrier. We humans often have something startlingly similar; an imaginary obstacle over which we hesitate to climb even when, in reality, it does not exist.

In our minds as well as in the small brain of a bird, fish, mouse or monkey, there can exist a barrier, an obstruction that bars our progress.
