

Educators Discuss Placement Plan In State's System

Eugene—Another step in the present educational trend to benefit the exceptional student by bringing high schools and colleges closer together was taken at the University of Oregon Tuesday.

A committee of Oregon educators met to begin the coordination of high school and college advanced placement programs.

The committee, as yet unnamed, was formed at an educational conference on the university campus March 29.

Local school officials who did not take part in the planning conference will be invited to join in the committee's development.

Colleges Material

The proposed coordinated program will allow high school students to study college level material while still in high school. If the student passes the college achievement exams, he will then be allowed to skip freshmen-level college courses which would duplicate this previous training.

The committee's preliminary studies indicate that five Oregon colleges, the two Eugene high schools, and Springfield High school have advanced placement programs.

Many other of the state's high schools have college preparatory and gifted student programs which are not part of an advanced placement program.

Roland Bartel, assistant dean of the University's College of Liberal Arts, said studies show that programs such as this will help both fast and moderate learners to do better. The coordination and promotion of advanced placement would assure the serious student that his quality work in high school may be continued in college.

Use of Chemical In Sterilization Of Insects Eyed

Washington—(Science Service)—Control of house flies and fruit flies by chemical sterilization, so that they cannot reproduce, is being tried in experiments by the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

The experiments, involving one of three new methods of insect control proposed by USDA's Dr. Edward T. Knippling, make use of a modified glutamic acid to bring about self-sterilization of insects by chemical sterilization.

Tests have shown that a concentration of as little as one one-hundredth of one percent of this chemical, added to food for laboratory-reared house flies, has prevented egg-laying or hatching and that one-half of one percent in a single feeding will cause permanent sterility in female flies.

To Avoid Adverse Effects

Male flies, according to tests made so far, are not sterilized by eating food containing the chemical. To be fully effective, chemical sexual sterilants of maximum effectiveness will have to produce sexual sterility in both males and females without adverse effects on mating behavior.

Chemical sterilization, if eventually successful, would not require release of treated flies to wipe out normal ones because food treated with an effective chemical sterilant could be made generally available.

May Not Be Suitable

Although satisfactory for use in testing the principle of chemical sterilization, the USDA points out, modified glutamic acid may not prove completely suitable as a practical means of insect control by this method.

The other two control and eradication methods suggested by Dr. Knippling include the production and release of diseased insects to infect and kill their own kind, and of insects possessing lethal genetic traits that could control an insect pest. The first of these is already being investigated.
