VAN HEFLIN INSISTS:

"ACTORS SHOULD ACT THEIR AGE!"

In the long run, Hollywood can't hood-wink Father Time—or movie audiences, either—this veteran claims

By PEER J. OPPENHEIMER

As in his newest film, "Jovanka and the Others," Van picks roles to fit his age.

"ACTORS should act their age!" says Van Heflin, a veteran actor who should know. "Old-timers can be successful playing opposite young girls," he says, "as long as the characters they portray fit their own ages. But when they keep on living off their old glory, the result can be artistic or financial failure—often both."

Van, who is 49, believes that in the long run it doesn't pay for an actor to portray much younger characters. For when the time comes that the public refuses to take him seriously, and he hasn't built a reputation for true acting ability, the bottom can drop out of his career completely.

"In the old days, audiences were more evenly divided among all age groups, and scenarios emphasized mature people," Van points out. "But in recent years, stories have been geared to a younger audience, particularly teen-agers. Many leading men felt they had to be made up to look younger than they are or take years off their age by playing opposite young women."

Heflin admits that the popularity of "the old young men" assures them the pick of choice scripts, but he still wouldn't trade places with them. "I enjoy doing what I'm best suited for artistically," he says. "This has provided me with a steady, high income, and that's not bad."

Fredric March has aged naturally in his films. Example is "Middle of the Night" with Kim Novak.

In "They Came to Cordura," both Rita Hayworth and Gary Cooper allowed themselves to "age."
