Too Many Battlefields Pose Problem for Southern States

Atlanta (UPI)—The South is getting ready for the centennial celebration of the Civil War with an embarrassment of riches — too many battlefields.

If the Yankees want to do any celebrating next year, they'll probably have to come South to find a suitable site to celebrate a victory. But the southern states all have committees hard at work picking out appropriate battles for re-enactment. A legend has it that the South won all the battles.

Take Tennessee. There were more than 800 battles fought in Tennessee between 1861 and 1865, and everybody is partial to his own battle. Col. Cambell Brown, head of Tennessee's Civil War Centennial Planning Committee, looked over the bewildering array of possibilities and decided to do a little legend-trampling — not a laughing matter in Dixie.

Committee Investigates
Col. Brown, convinced there is a certain amount of "wrong information" about the war for southern independence, has sent a nine-man committee around the state to form local committees that will dig through old trunks, attics, newspapers, handbills, letters and other assorted memorabilia to "put the Civil War in its true perspective."

Therein lies a possible solution to the dilemma.

If everybody would get together and agree to celebrate only the Battle of Natural Bridge, Fla., honor would be saved on both sides though legends might be trampled.

That was a battle.

Legend has it that on the night of March 6, 1865, the engineer of a puffing locomotive which had raced from St. Marks to Tallahassee, Fla., aroused the good people of Tallahassee with the blast of his whistle.

Warns of Yankees
His news was that Union Gen. John Newton with a fleet of 16 ships — including a New York ferryboat — had put ashore about 900 Negro troops to capture the Florida capital.

Radio Liberty Fights Cold War Seven Days a Week

Munich (UPI)—Out of a steel and concrete building here goes crackling across the iron curtain a barrage of broadcasts in 17 languages. Radio Liberty (RL) fights the cold war of the air waves 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

There are some 10,000,000 privately owned radio sets in the Soviet Union and this is Radio Liberty's potential audience. It is trying to explain the western way of life to the persons who gather around these radio sets from the Polish border to the Siberian Steppes.

How many Russians listen? How are they affected by what they hear? Is Radio Liberty getting through to its listeners or is it, in effect, talking into a dead microphone.

Audience Size Measured
Researchers for Radio Liberty strive constantly to measure the size of the audience inside Russia. For example, an announcer will say at the end of a particular program: "If you liked this feature please write us at Box 7, Stockholm," or "Box 49, Paris."

A flood of mail will come pouring in within a day or two, but by the end of the week Soviet authorities will have succeeded in shutting off all letters and postcards addressed to that box number. But an analysis will give a clue to the overall number of listeners, since these documents have a surprisingly even geographical distribution.

Hundreds of Soviet tourists to the Brussels World's Fair and the Vienna Youth Festival were interrogated by RL assistants. Specifically they were asked how much they and other Russians listened to Radio Liberty, BBC and the Voice of America.

Habits Obtained
Since the thaw in East-West relations following the death of Stalin, large numbers of non-Russians have been repatriated from the Soviet Union, particularly former Greek, Spanish and German prisoners of war. From these some evidences of life inside the Communist world and the habits of radio listening have been obtained.

Finally Radio Liberty researchers have continuous, systematic talks with western visitors to Russia, many of whom speak Russian fluently.

The Family Council

Stephen F.—I want to help Dora.

Georgianna F. — She's a vampire in a middy blouse.

Stephen F.—Eight years ago, before I was married, I became very much involved with a girl of 18.

Dora was an exceptionally naive girl for her age and I'm afraid she fell all too easily for my line. We had an affair and I guess she just fell seriously in love with me, although I couldn't reciprocate.

In any case, I met her recently and she confessed she has never been able to care for anyone else. She is very unhappy and wants to get married, yet she says she always thinks about me. I pointed out that I'm now a family man with three children. She said she understood, but loved me just the same. I want to help this girl by inviting her to our home and introducing her to people, but my wife objects to having her.

Georgianna F. — What a nerve! I'm simply furious, but Steve thinks I have nothing to be sore about.

This poor, poor, little Dora is a vampire in a middy blouse if ever I saw one. Does she really think she can get away with going around telling married men she's in love with them? I don't care what happened eight years ago. That's done and what's happened now. She happens to be a very attractive girl and I don't like the way she looks at Steve.

Steve thinks I'm a mean, jealous woman for not wanting to help the girl find a husband. Well, I just don't consider that my responsibility. Steve has a guilt complex about this girl. He's sure he ruined her life, but I frankly wonder.

The Council: — We're with Georgianna. Her instincts are right on the beam.

We hate to disillusion Steve but we are very dubious about the idea that Dora has been carrying a torch for him for eight years. We think she is either lying or using his image as a shield against marriage, which for some deep-rooted reason she fears.
