Man's Intelligence Unchanged Over Ages But Future Bright

Tokyo – (Science Service) – The development of interplanetary space vehicles does not show any greater born mental capacity than the ancient invention and use of the wheel and bow and arrow, Dr. Laurence H. Snyder, biologist and president of the University of Hawaii, told the symposium on science and modern civilization held here (Tokyo) today.

"There has been little or no anatomical change in man over the last half million years and there is no good evidence that intelligence has changed either," Dr. Snyder said in stressing that man's biological evolution has been, and will continue to be, very slow indeed.

On the other hand, changes in human social and political organization have taken place at unbelievably rapid rates in the past, and, in Dr. Snyder's opinion, will continue to do so in the future.

A tremendous future challenge, in Dr. Snyder's opinion, will be successful efforts by social scientists that will enable mankind to use more constructively the vast latent biological potentialities which exist in all peoples everywhere. This could be accomplished by the newer techniques of social science, reinforced by modern genetic knowledge and augmented by an educated and informed public.

Dr. Snyder said that the argument that there will be harmful effects upon mankind from undesirable genes, created by radiation and other effects, is fallacious in some respects. He pointed out that the essential fallacy consists in the application of the epithets "deleterious," "harmful," or "undesirable" to the mutant genes themselves rather than to their effects.

If, through modern medical, social, or economic progress, selection has been relaxed against any gene with harmful effects, he said, this relaxation has been accomplished only because the medical, social or economic agencies have provided environments in which the effects of the genes are rendered less harmful or quite innocuous.

As to those genes that persist in producing detrimental effects in all known environments and despite all attempts at therapy, he said, selection against them remains today as severe and effective as ever. And selection will again begin to operate against any gene for which it has been relaxed if the burden of providing the necessary therapeutic conditions begins to outweigh the social value of providing them.
