

Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

The Charming Meadowlark Is Cleverly Disguised

Rural America is more beautiful because of this cheerful bird that someone called the Oil Field Lark, Crescent Star, Mudlark or Marsh Quail, but which is more commonly known as the bird of the grassy meadow—the meadowlark.

Any bird that sings so sweetly and spends so much of its time in a meadow would just naturally be called a meadowlark.

Other species of meadowlark found throughout parts of the west and a smaller, somewhat darker colored variety, common in Florida, extend the range of this beloved bird to practically the entire United States.

The meadowlark is about the size of the quail and like the game bird is brown and black, streaked with white markings. The tail of the lark is short and pointed and the bill long and slender. And of course the meadowlark wears a bright yellow vest and a black neck-scarf.

The clear, flute-like whistle of the meadowlark is an inseparable part of American farmlands and hillsides, and adds a great deal of charm to rural life.

Finding the nest of the meadowlark is an experience in perseverance for the nest is always cleverly hidden, usually with a canopy of grass woven over the top like a protective hood. In many nests there is even a tunnel, made by interlacing grass stems together through which the mother and father bird can come and go from the concealed nest. Living as they do on the ground, every precaution must be taken to keep secret the nest's location, for on the ground a host of two and four footed enemies are always searching for tasty eggs or tender young birds.

Nature cleverly designed this bird, and then took extensive measures for the bird's protection. One can hardly help noticing that a meadowlark, sitting on a fence post facing you, is a pretty conspicuous object. The bright yellow vest with the black throat patch is plainly visible from a considerable distance.

But if a hawk or a boy with a gun shows up, the lark quickly flies directly to the ground where it squats. Now the bright yellow cannot be seen. The brown and black of the birds back blends in perfectly with the surroundings. Its ability to change its color does not indicate the meadowlark is "two-faced," but rather "two-bodied." The side of itself the meadowlark shows to its friends is bright and sunny, but the side it shows to its enemies is so drab and dull that it is practically invisible.

Bowles To Head Demo Committee

Los Angeles—(AP)—Chester Bowles, Connecticut congressman who is an advisor to Sen. John F. Kennedy, will head the important Platform committee at the Democratic 1960 convention.

Bowles, 59, former Connecticut governor and ex-ambassador to India who has exerted a strong liberal voice in the Democratic Party, was unanimously chosen by the 14-member Arrangements committee as Platform committee chairman.

Often mentioned as a possible vice presidential or even presidential candidate, Bowles as head of the Platform committee will wield considerable power in selecting the party's platform at the convention opening here July 11.
