Annual Meeting of Sites Foundation Scheduled Monday

The Siskiyou Pioneer Sites Foundation will hold its third annual meeting Monday, May 2, at 8 p.m. in the Brunner building in Jacksonville, Mrs. Janice Stoughton, secretary, has [illegible].

[illegible] for the coming year will be [illegible] of the Foundation and [illegible] are invited to attend.

The Foundation, a non-profit corporation for the [illegible] of historic sites [illegible] as its [illegible] the historic buildings [illegible] especially in Jacksonville.

[illegible] for restoration of the U.S. Hotel, and some funds are now available for the project. Other buildings in Jacksonville as well as other historic sites of this area, are planned for restoration.

Members Approached

Several Foundation members have been approached however, with the question of "Why should these sites be restored?"

Foundation officials said they feel as Louis C. Jones feels in his recent article, "A Look At Historic Preservation" in "Primer for Preservation: A Handbook for Historic Housekeeping," the publication of the National Trust for Historic Preservation, Washington, D.C.

Jones noted: "Things that have been in a family a long time have a magic of their own, asserting the values of life and its survival. So it is with each village and city. They, too need focal points of affection, of the historic community spirit. The variety of these places can, and should be, numberless, each suited to its own history and people. In a very real sense these should be shrines where the spiritual values of our people are cherished and nourished."

He said as "progress goes from some place to some place, and if we would know where we are and where we are going, we must also keep a few points on the chart to indicate where we have been." The past, Jones wrote, should have as many personal ties for each of "us as possible, for none should feel that he is floating in time, rootless and unrelated to all that has happened to our fathers."

Jones suggested replacing the original furniture, reproduce the wallpaper, train a guide in costume, and do a historically complete job of recreating life as it was once in a historic site that has meaning for a specific town, [illegible] Pass.

"If we can do that well," he said, "and if we make the house into an active, functioning part of community life constantly interpreting [illegible] ideas of the past so possible in terms the people of today can understand."

If restoration is not immediately possible, Jones suggested [illegible] and holding the site since it may become [illegible] at a future date to restore.

"Between the fully revitalized historic house, which is currently our ideal, and the preservation of the architectural shell, which is the least we can hope for, there are hundreds of compromises any one of which might be the solution for a specific community," Jones wrote.

Workable Solutions

Jones did not advocate destruction if restoration is not possible. "Time itself may produce workable solutions," he said.

Restoration, he noted, should not be confined to "the handsome residences of the 'best people'. We need to preserve buildings that speak directly to those of us whose families had callouses as well as to those who had carriages." It is important, he said, to interpret the ways men and women worked and created and played.

Jones suggested that Americans look at restoration in terms "that add meaning to their own everyday lives, that place their jobs, their responsibilities as citizens and parents, in historic context so that they see their present problems, not as exceptions, but as continuations of the challenge faced by their forefathers."

Race Heavy Undercurrent as Hubert, Morse Ready for Capital's 'Primary'

By A. ROBERT SMITH
Mail Tribune
Washington Correspondent

Washington (Special) – If religion is the main undercurrent of the West Virginia primary, race is the heaviest undercurrent in the District of Columbia primary between Senators Wayne Morse and Hubert Humphrey.

The outcome will be determined in Tuesday's balloting here in what is the nation's oddest election.

Sandwiched between their appearances in other states where they are seeking presidential convention delegates, Morse and Humphrey have conducted a slam-bang campaign here for many weeks, making speeches at luncheon and dinner gatherings, in churches, restaurants, theatres and wherever their campaign managers could corral an audience.

Race has become a heavy, if not the dominant, factor in the D.C. election because of the bi-racial composition of the voting population here. Over half of the 800,000 residents of Washington, D. C., are Negroes.

Because this is such an odd and relatively insignificant election, less than one in 10 residents are registered to vote. Residents of the nation's capital are not permitted to vote for any officeholder, neither the President of the United States nor members of the school board. All local office holders are appointed directly or indirectly by the White House.

The only thing voters will be able to decide in Tuesday's election is their choice of delegates to the presidential nominating conventions; and for the 45,000 registered Democrats there will be the choice of whether they prefer Morse or Humphrey for President. There is an unofficial slate of delegates for Adlai Stevenson, but Stevenson has suggested that voters choose between the Senators.

Heavy Negro Vote

There is no way of knowing what proportion of the registered voters are white or colored, but the obvious appeals to Negro voters by both senators is indicative of their presumption that Negroes will cast a good many of the ballots Tuesday.

Race became an open issue in the campaign three weeks ago after a group of Negro leaders appealed to both candidates to give their endorsement to a "qualified Negro" for the position of Democratic national committeeman. No specific person was suggested. Morse said he would have to study the situation. His choice for national committeeman was the incumbent, J. C. Turner, who is white and is also chairman of the Washington Central Labor council, whose endorsement Morse has sought.

Humphrey quickly responded with an endorsement of a Negro attorney, Frank D. Reeves, for national committeeman. Morse turned on Humphrey with an outraged cry of "racism." He claimed Humphrey was backing the Negro candidate only because of his race. Yet when questioned at a news conference, Morse did not dispute the Negro's qualifications for the post.

"This is a sad development in American politics," said Morse. "I am convinced that it means no good either for the voters whose votes are sought on the basis of race or religion, nor for the candidates who seek them. The words white, colored, Protestant, Catholic and Jew have no legitimate place in American political campaigns. Hubert tried to say as much in Wisconsin; I am sorry he is not willing to do the same in the Nation's capital."

Humphrey called the charge of racism "nonsense." Besides the endorsement of some Negro leaders, Humphrey has imported Jackie Robinson, the retired baseball star, to make some public appearances in his behalf.

Candidates Courting

Not to be outdone in courting Negro voters, Morse has countered with the fact that his slate of delegate candidates contains more Negroes than does Humphrey's slate. A sample ballot mailed by Morse headquarters last week to all registered voters carries as the second reason for voting for the Oregon senator's slate this statement: "50 per cent more fully integrated than any other slate of delegates and alternates." To prove his point, the sample ballot carries a picture of each member of Morse's slate.

Morse didn't wait for his opponent to make an appeal to colored residents. At the formal opening of his first Presidential campaign headquarters here, he told an applauding group of admirers how he had come to be a champion of home rule for the district. He discovered, he told them, that some senators were privately warning that a home rule plan should not include an elected mayor because the chances were that the nation's capital would end up with a Negro mayor. When he heard that argument, that was the signal for him to pitch in with all he had to fight for an elected mayor, Morse told them.

Morse is considered by many observers to be the favorite to win Tuesday because in recent years, as a member of the Senate District of Columbia committee, he has championed numerous local causes with considerable success. Last year when the Eisenhower Administration's home rule bill came up in the Senate, Morse got it sidetracked in favor of his own which was passed. The Administration bill provided for a governor appointed by the President, and an elected legislative assembly, but no mayor; while Morse's bill provides for an elected mayor, city council and school board.

Billboards, campaign posters and bumper strips for Morse emphasize the association between the senator and home rule: "D.C. Wants to Vote–Vote for Wayne Morse."

Morse also successfully championed a school lunch program for many children in the poorer sections of Washington. He says Humphrey is Johnny-come-lately in trying to solve local problems.

But Humphrey tells voters they are picking "a President of the United States and not a head of the District Committee."

Needed Vehicle

Morse has explained that he got into the race here at the suggestion of A. L. Wheeler, a Georgia-born attorney who has for many years been chairman of the Democratic central committee here. Humphrey forces contend that Wheeler needed a good vehicle on which to ride back into office as committee chairman, inasmuch as his leadership is being challenged by another faction. Humphrey's manager claims Wheeler offered to support Humphrey, if the rival faction would support his re-election.

"Rebuffed by the Humphrey group, Wheeler has not delivered the central committee endorsement to Senator Morse in reprisal," Humphrey's manager declared.

The leader of the anti-Wheeler fight is Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., who is chief attorney for Rep. Charles O. Porter in his law suit for a passport to visit Red China. Porter has made a few public appearances here in Humphrey's behalf.

While neither Morse nor Humphrey is given much chance to get the presidential nomination, the outcome here could be influential in the pre-convention period. If Humphrey loses here, some think it will hurt his chances of beating Senator John F. Kennedy in the West Virginia primary a week late – a possible circumstance which would make Humphrey a three-time loser before he ever reaches the Oregon primary free-for-all May 20.

This possible development would make Kennedy a three-time winner going into the Oregon primary, assuming he can defeat Senator Morse in the May 17 Maryland primary, which Morse concedes is likely.

So if he defeats Humphrey, Morse would not only enhance his own prestige, he could conceivably indirectly strengthen Kennedy, the one candidate most likely to give him trouble in his own home state.

The only tangible stakes here Tuesday are nine delegates, out of the 761 needed for the presidential nomination at Los Angeles in July.
