Summit Leaders Hope To Crack Long Standing Deadlock on Disarmament

Paris (UPI)—The summit leaders hope at their Paris meeting to crack through a 15-year-old East-West deadlock on disarmament.

But first they must find an answer to the problem that has eluded Russia and the West almost since the end of World War II—how to devise a control system that prevents cheating.

Without such guarantees the West feels it would have no security. There would be no certainty that if the United States and its Allies throw away all their planes, rockets and H-bombs, the Russians might not cheat and keep some of theirs.

The result would be disastrous for the West. That is why the Western Allies insist on built-in guarantees against cheating. So far the Russians have refused to give them.

Make Little Headway

The Western Allies and the Soviet bloc have been struggling with this problem in the 10-nation Geneva disarmament talks since March 15 without making much headway.

The summit leaders may have to provide the answer.

After complete stalemate on disarmament since 1957 the Soviets and the Western Allies went to the Geneva talks with two rival disarmament plans.

The Western plan provided for gradual, balanced and carefully policed disarmament without any definite time limit.

The Soviet plan called for total world disarmament within four years.

Let's agree to disarm first and then talk about controls afterwards," reiterated Soviet delegation chief Valerian Zorin each time the West brought up the question of guarantees against cheating.

Hope for Break

The West hopes Khrushchev himself may crack the deadlock at the summit by agreeing to the kind of controls the West feels it must have.

One hopeful sign, which became clear early in the Geneva talks, was that both sides are aware that, although the problem is the same as 13 years ago, the danger is infinitely more deadly.

It involves not only conventional armies and weapons, but nuclear weapons and inter-continental rockets of mass destruction.

Within a few years, both sides have admitted, it almost certainly will involve outer space satellites with nuclear warheads—the ultimate weapon on which France's disarmament expert Jules Moch warned would be "hanging over our heads like thousands of Swords of Damocles."

The summit leaders will be aware that time is running out on chances of agreeing to outlaw them.

On the day of her arrival she plans an afternoon news conference and a speech that night to the Oregon Federated Women's Clubs here. She will take part May 12 and 13 in the Oregon Democratic Women's Peace Conference. On May 14 she will accompany former California Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas to Medford to attend the Roosevelt Memorial dinner there. Her schedule calls for her to be in Grants Pass and Roseburg May 15; Coos Bay the morning and afternoon of May 16; Eugene and Lane county the evening of May 16 and all day May 17; Linn and Benton counties May 18, and Marion county May 19.

Escapees Hated Stormy Weather

Livingston, Tenn. — Two prisoners broke out of jail and ran up a 180-foot high perch atop a water tower. Sheriff's deputies looked at the sky, sniffed the air and settled back in their cars for a short wait.

The runaways were back in custody soon after the thunderstorm broke loose.

Now the Hounds Rate Room Service

Chicago—Now comes room service for dogs.

A dog food manufacturer and a coast-to-coast motel chain have teamed up to provide free dog dinners for canine guests.

Washington—(UPI)—The Oregon State Board of Higher Education has applied to the federal communications commission for permission to operate an education channel 10 television station at Eugene.

Fascinating Facts About Insect Blood Uncovered

Corvallis—Some fascinating facts about insect blood – how it can be used like fingerprints to identify species of insects the eye can't separate, and how the color and quantity varies – has been uncovered in basic research at Oregon State college.

The studies by Dr. William P. Stephen, research entomologist, are a phase of long-range data gathering for pest control and teaching programs and provide new information about some patterns of insect development.

Some species of insects may look exactly alike but the blood "type" is different, Dr. Stephen pointed out.

Composition of Blood

The composition of insect blood is similar in some ways to man's, but the color differs. Insect blood is ordinarily transluscent, but the color is often influenced by what the insect eats. Grasshopper blood takes on a green-grass tinge at times and insects fed red beets came up with reddish blood.

The insect blood has only one of the two major purposes of human blood—that of carrying food to the tissues. Air vents in insects directly serve the muscle tissue with oxygen without help from the very simple blood system, according to Stephen. Insect blood clots remarkably fast in some cases as a protective mechanism.

Surprisingly enough, some of the higher groups of insects – wasps and bees – have very little blood compared to roaches, grubs, beetles and flies. Female insects have more blood than males and have higher levels of proteins and amino acids in the blood, presumably because of their egg-laying responsibilities.

Special microscopic equipment is used in the studies. A fraction of a drop of blood is sufficient to study.
