

True and False Test Devised for Egg Knowledge

Los Angeles—Science Service—How much do you know about eggs? Probably less than you think.

University of California agricultural and nutrition experts here have devised a true-and-false test to help dispel widely held misconceptions about eggs. See how you do.

1. The darkness of an egg's yolk indicates its superior food value?
2. Poorly fed chickens produce nutritionally inferior eggs?
3. Eggs with brown shells have better quality and flavor?
4. Egg white does not contain any food value?
5. That twisted white cord on each side of the yolk means the egg has been fertilized?

Explanations
The experts do not mean to be hardboiled, but if you answered "true" to any of these, you failed the test. Here are the explanations they shell-ed out:

1. Hens receive a colorless vitamin A which they transfer to the egg. This, and not the color, give the egg its food value.
2. A laying hen receiving insufficient proteins, carbohydrates, fats, vitamins or minerals, does not lay a "bad egg"; she simply lays less eggs, producing only when her body has stored the necessary ingredients for eggs of nutritionally high quality.
3. No Quality Difference
Scientists throughout the years have found no quality or flavor difference between eggs with brown or white shells. (They admit, though, that the shells themselves might have a different taste.)
4. Egg white contains more than half of the protein and about three-fourths of the riboflavin.
5. All eggs fertilized or not, contain a white, cord-like material called the chalazas which anchors the yolk to the layer of thick albumen. The chalazas is composed of high quality protein.

Russ Animals Learn To Signal Ailments

New York (Science Service)—Russian scientists were reported here to have the know-how for training space animals to send messages about their physical conditions to ground stations.
The Russian know-how was described at a meeting at Columbia university by Dr. Gregory Razran, chairman of the department of psychology at Queens college. He has been analyzing Soviet research under a grant from the National Institutes of Health.
He said the Russians can condition animals to perform certain acts when their blood pressure or rate of breathing changes. He said a dog in a satellite could be conditioned to push a lever or button with his paw to signal his physical condition to the earth.

Farmers Shouldn't Play Veterinarian

Chicago—(Science Service)—Farmers are warned against do-it-yourself treatment of animals in an editorial in the current Journal of the American Veterinary Medical Association.

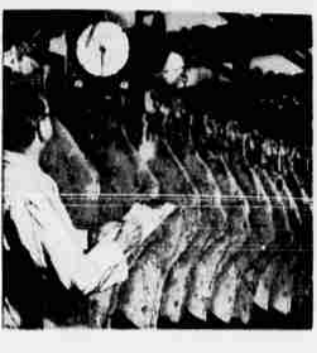

The editorial blames pharmaceutical advertising for leading dairymen to attempt vein puncture and other techniques requiring veterinarian training.
The journal reports that indiscreet medication of animals headed for immediate slaughter will result in consumers eating unsafe and adulterated foods made impure by drug residues in the flesh. Surveys by the Food and Drug administration since 1957 have proved this danger.
For example, dangerous residues of penicillin found in milk were considered largely due to improper use of mastitis infusion preparations or failure to follow instructions on packaged products requiring that milk from treated cows be withheld from the market for 72 hours.

13 Unlucky for Jail's Prisoners

Miami, Fla.—Those unlucky enough to wind up in Miami's new jail building, now under construction, can console themselves that fate had the cards stacked.
