Need for Native Clergymen Stressed by Church Leaders

BY LOUIS CASSELS United Press International

Far-sighted church leaders have been warning for years that a radical change in missionary strategy is necessary if Christianity is to make headway against the tide of nationalism sweeping the undeveloped countries of the world.

They have said that foreign missionaries must move into the background and let native clergymen take over the main burden of preaching the gospel. Otherwise, the Christian faith will be stigmatized as a "white man's export."

What are American and European churches doing to adapt their mission programs to this new fact of international life?

Precious Little.
Jarring Conclusion

That jarring conclusion stands out from a massive study of theological education abroad, conducted for John D. Rockefeller Jr.'s Sealeatic Fund by Yorke Allen Jr., Allen's 640-page report, entitled "A Seminary Survey," has just been published by Harper & Brothers.

It shows that seminaries for training native clergymen have not been given a high priority in mission programs. Quite the contrary.

Of the nearly 150 million dollars which American Protestants contribute annually to foreign missions, only about $2,500,000 - less than two per cent - is being invested in support of theological schools in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Of the 25,058 North American Protestant missionaries now in the field, only 433 - again, less than two per cent - are engaged primarily in educating native-born candidates for the ministry.

Britain Does Little
Britain, the only other Western country which sends out a large number of Protestant missionaries, is doing even less to train a home-grown clergy for the indigenous "young churches." Its leading missionary societies earmark about one per cent of their budgets for support of seminaries.

Allen says the Catholic church long neglected the training of a native priesthood, and in fact lagged behind Protestant churches in this effort "until recently."

But he believes that the Catholic church is now fully awake to the implications of the world situation, and that in recent years it has been "proceeding at a greater rate than the Protestant churches" to build up a large, adequately educated native clergy.

He notes that in 1929, the Catholic church had 60 foreign priests for every 40 local priests in mission lands. Today, the ratio is nearly reversed - 46 foreign priests for every 54 local priests.

Protestant Effort Fragmented
The Catholic church is able to adapt its strategy more readily because its entire global mission is under central control of the Vatican.

But the Protestant missionary effort is fragmented almost beyond belief. There are more than 450 separate Protestant boards and agencies in the world which are conducting missionary activities of some sort.

Many of them are supported by fundamentalist groups which, Allen says, are still wedded to the 18th Century concept of missionary endeavor, and are not interested in training an indigenous ministry overseas.

This places an even greater responsibility on the big, ecumenically-minded Protestant denominations, Allen contends. If there is to be adequate financial support for Protestant theological education in underdeveloped countries, it will have to come primarily from such U.S. bodies as the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Christians and United Church of Christ.

Conversion

Christ once said, "Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted; and become as little children, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven." To be converted is to turn about. Where you spend eternity depends on what you do in this life. Now is the accepted time; today is the day of salvation. Christ told man what to do to be converted. He then gave divine examples to show man how it is done.
