Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

A Toad with Hiccups, But 'Tain't Funny To The Toad

Perhaps he had eaten too much too fast. At any rate, the little toad was hiccuping every 11 seconds, each convulsive jerk nearly lifting him off his puffy underside. With every spine-jarring hic he would close his eyes. Although there was no noticeable expression on his bland little face, he gave every evidence of discomfort; he would much rather not have what was jerking him.

Nothing Funny

He, the toad, had no idea what was happening. He didn't know he had a diaphragm that was twitching spasmodically every few seconds, or that other creatures, too, frequently had to suffer the disconcerting indignity of this hiccuping.

Boils, black eyes, warts, paper hats or hiccups are very comical on the other fellow. But the poor unfortunate who is enterataining them fails to see anything humorous in the affliction.

With a toad, a dog, a monkey or a man, the first few hiccups are funny, later they become embarrassing, then uncomfortable and, if they persist for any great length of time, can even become dangerous. They have been known to continue until the twitching victim becomes completely exhausted.

Diaphram Twitches

Separating the upper and lower sections of most animal bodies is a divider known as the diaphragm. In appearance it somewhat resembles a cellophane or plastic object. For various reasons this diaphragm sometimes starts to twitch or jerk or vibrate like the head of a drum.

It can be caused by various actions of nerves, brought about by too much to eat, eating too fast, partaking of too rich food or because some nerve is acting up. Irritation of certain nerves may even trigger it.

The person who over-indulges in strong drink is frequently bothered by this violent perking. He may start and hic with provoking regularity. The diaphragm twangs, the sudden inspiration is suddenly checked by the closing of the glottis producing the characteristic sound and the reason for the expression, "pardon me."

Home Remedies

Many home remedies for hiccups have been tried, such as holding the breath, breathing into a paper bag, drinking water slowly or being half scared to death. Drastic measures, such as firing a gun unexpectedly behind the hiccuping one's back, was a standard procedure and claimed to be effective.

Some determined souls, feeling superior to such a silly thing as a hiccup, tried by sheer will-power to interrupt the rhythum-sequence of the hiccups. Sometimes such self-contained treatments were successful.

None of these remedies, however, seemed applicable to the little fat toad. So I left him there in the fern-bed, his violent internal twitching telegraphing its jarring impulse throughout his entire body every 11 seconds.

The Medical Roundup

by Walter Alvarez

Emeritus Consultant in Medicine Mayo Clinic
Emeritus Professor of Medicine Mayo Clinic

Sinus Trouble

I cannot tell people what to do for sinus trouble if only because so many thousands of people who thing they have it, haven't. Usually, when a patient comes in to complain of sinustitis, the first thing I do is say, "Let me see your handkerchief." If it is perfectly clean, the person can hardly have much sinusitis. I have good reason for knowing this because, throughout all of my long life I have been subject to attacks of severe sinusitis. When I am in a spell, by noon my pockets are full of several very dirty handkerchiefs. When the attack is over, I can go for days with one perfectly clean handkerchief.

Dr. Alvarez

A few hundred times, when I have sent a patient who thought he had sinusitis to a good nose man, the doctor has reported that the nose was perfectly clean. There was no sinusitis. What the patient was terribly disturbed over was a post-nasal drip. But that consisted of a little white mucus, or a little jelly-like material that was perfectly harmless. Persons with a real sinusitis involving most of the cavities in their facial bones sometimes have such a peculiar appearance, with a wide nose, that I will suspect what is wrong as they come into the office. I am sure of it when I hear the peculiar voice, and perhaps note a little wheezing due to asthma. When I was young, a few nose specialists used to operate extensively on these persons, trying to clean out all of the diseased bone, but they soon quit because all they got for the patient was a big, bad-smelling and uncomfortable "cavern."

Today, sometimes, infected sinuses can be drained. Often it helps much to make a little window from each infected antrum (a hollow in the cheek bone) into the nose. Then the pus can drain out. The secret is to go to a good nose man and to take his advice.

The discomfort of sinusitis is so distinctive that once one has come to know it, one can recognize it in a minute. It is not like an ordinary headache; often it is localized in one or two parts of the face – where the pus is.
