Rapid Inflation Of Lungs Starts Stopped Heart

Milwaukee, Wis. – (Science Service) – When a patient's heart stops beating on the operating table it may be possible to start it beating again simply by inflating the lungs vigorously with oxygen.

Dr. Jay Jacoby of the Marquette University Medical School told a meeting of the State Medical Society of Wisconsin here that for the time being doctors should continue their present resuscitation measures of opening the chest, squeezing the heart rhythmically to restore circulation, and giving artificial respiration through a tube inserted into the windpipe. However, he asserted, "the whole idea of treatment for cardiac arrest (heart stoppage) needs re-evaluation."

Accidental Discovery

Formerly on the staff of the Ohio State University Medical School, Dr. Jacoby said he and his colleagues there discovered accidentally that it might not be necessary to open the chest for restarting the heart when asphyxiation is the cause of cardiac arrest.

Experiments with dogs then showed that pumping oxygen into the lungs could raise blood pressure, increase the oxygen content of the blood, and circulate the blood a little to bring enough freshened blood to the heart to start it beating again.

Dr. Jacoby said the circulation apparently is caused by the inflated lungs squeezing the heart and large blood vessels. He said he did not recommend the new method for use as yet, since it was still experimental.

Automation Strikes Sour Note in Schools

Newark, N.J.—The "battle of automation" is raging in this city's school system. The board of education has threatened the jobs of 12 school pianists.

The board says the pianists who play for creative dancing and rhythm exercises in girls' gym classes, can be replaced by phonographs and records at an annual saving of $30,000.

Says Mrs. Stella Lass, a spokesman for the pianists: "You can't replace a live pianist with a dead machine."

Truck Driver's Last Cruise Was Costly

Milwaukee — Patrolman Robert Weigman watched in astonishment as a truck screeched to a halt and the driver leaped from the cab and slammed a beer bottle on the radiator with the declaration: "I christen thee."

The driver told Weigman his license had been revoked by the state a day earlier and he decided to take one final drive, ending it by christening the truck and putting it up on blocks for a year.

Weigman hauled the driver off to court. The fine for the final drive came to $100.
