Sameness Bothers Men More Than Cold in Antarctic

Atlantic City—(Science Service)—It is not the cold, the danger or the hardship that puts a strain on men stationed in Antarctic posts for a year. Capt. Charles Samuel Mullin Jr., of the U.S. Navy Medical Corps stationed at the U.S. Naval Hospital in Philadelphia, told the American Psychiatric Association meeting here.

Three things contribute to the unusual stress experienced, he said. The most important is the difficulty of getting along in the "tight little society" in which he is placed.

Dependent on Each Other
Each man soon learns that he is entirely dependent upon the next man and on the group. This means that if he becomes angry, he will not show it. Fights are very rare, but headaches are extraordinarily common.

The inner tensions due to swallowed anger also contribute to insomnia, or the "Big Eye," which is common during the round-the-clock darkness of winter.

The second stress is the sameness encountered by the men—the same few faces, the same surroundings, the same relatively simple routine of life and the long period of enforced physical inactivity.

Appetites Enormous
The third stress is the absence of family and loved ones and of the familiar pleasures of the man's "personal civilization." As might be expected, Capt. Mullin said, the men try to make up for the other deprivations by the enjoyment of food. Appetite and consumption are enormous, he reported.

Sex deprivation does not seem to be an important problem to the men except in rare instances during periods of personal emotional upset.

Despite these difficulties, Capt. Mullin said that a group's morale is generally of a high order and so also is the group's effectiveness in the discharge of its functions. In fact, the men who spend the winter in remote stations feel that something worthwhile has happened to their personalities.

POTATO PEELER BREAKS
Walsall, England—(UPI)—Six women cooks went on strike at a canteen Tuesday claiming they had too much work because the potato peeling machine broke down.
