Adult Education Rapidly Becoming Major Function of Public Schools

By JAMES CASSELS
UPI Correspondent

In San Francisco, a 37-year-old widow sits in a high school class with girls less than half her age. She's preparing for a secretarial job that will support her family.
In Denver, a respected physician hurries home from a call to trade his black bag for a book of Shakespeare's plays. He's taking a night course in English literature — a subject he never got around to in medical school.
In a rural schoolhouse in central Florida, a 60-year-old Negro tenant farmer stands at a blackboard with tears in his eyes. For the first time in his life, he has written his own name.

These are some of the 4,500,000 American adults who are currently enrolled in public schools.
Becoming Major Function
Adult education is rapidly becoming a major function of public school systems in most states.
The number of adult students has tripled in the past 20 years. And educators look

For increasing salaries of state legislators: yes, 10,150; no, 9,037.
DOG CONTROL MEASURE
In Jackson county, for dogs running at large: yes, 8,584; no, 10,150. In Medford, for dogs running at large: yes, 2,445; no, 5,192.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE
Ashland district: Frances I. Gallatin, 4,413; Arthur M. Boner, 2,807.
Gold Hill district: Betty L. Ladd, 764; Norman R. Matson, 912.

for an even more rapid growth in enrollment during the next decade.

They point out that the potential "market" for adult education is enormous. There are 52 million Americans over age 25 who have never completed high school and 8 million of them are functionally illiterate.
Hard facts of economic life are driving many of them back to the classroom. Unskilled workers accounted for nearly two-thirds of the U.S. work force in 1900, but today only one job out of five can be filled by an untrained laborer. Automation and the rapid advance of technology are rapidly creating a situation in which a high school education is a virtual necessity for getting a decent job.

Other Magnets
But literacy, vocational training and a high school diploma are not the only magnets drawing adults to public school classes. Many of the students are men and women who have graduate from high school or even from college, but who feel a need to continue their education.

Some are retired people who want to cultivate a hobby, a new interest or a skill that can be used to earn extra money. Others are business and professional men, like the Denver doctor, who are trying to fill cultural gaps in their lives. Many are bored housewives seeking an intellectual stimulus to open new horizons.

A few communities have set up special public schools for adults, with classes beginning in early morning and continuing until late at night. But most adult classes are conducted during late afternoon or evening hours in public school buildings used by children during the day.

So far only ten states give systematic financial support, including funds for teachers salaries, to adult education programs. Elsewhere, local school boards provide the buildings and the students pay tuition fees to cover instructional costs.

Even though tuition costs are usually modest, they seem to make a considerable difference in determining how many students turn out for adult classes. Baltimore, Md., had a booming adult program as long as classes were free. But when it started charging tuition last year, enrollment dropped sharply.

Public misunderstanding also has handicapped the program, according to a spokesman for the National Association of Public School Adult Educators.
"Many people who would enjoy and profit from adult courses shy a way because they have the idea that adult education is solely for those who didn't get much schooling when they were young," he said. "Others have the false idea that adult courses are mainly recreational, artsy-craftsy stuff."
"Actually, the role of adult education is to help individuals to continue to grow throughout life. In this complex and fast-changing world today, no one ever really completes his education. There are always new things to learn, new insights to gain, new cultural frontiers to explore."
