New Theory of Solar System Birth Proposed

London (Science Service)—A new theory for the birth of the solar system's sun and planets was proposed here by a Hungarian scientist.

Prof. L. Egedy of Eotvos University in Budapest suggests that when the universe was very young, all matter in the solar system was concentrated in the sun. Because of this, the acceleration due to gravity in the sun was very great, and the sun's matter was highly concentrated. Its radius therefore was very small.

Increase in Diameter

Since then, centrifugal force that would force material out from the center of the spinning sun and gravitational acceleration have been decreasing. This would result in an increase in the sun's diameter.

At some time far in the past, centrifugal force became equal to the attraction of gravity at the solar equator, allowing part of the sun's mass to escape. This is how Prof. Egedy suggests that the various planets were formed—thrown out one at a time from the sun, with the outermost first.

The currently accepted view of solar system birth is that the planets resulted from gravitational attraction caused by eddies left by the original material forming the sun.

In the current British scientific journal, Nature, Prof. Egedy reported that his theory could also be applied to the formation of satellites circling the planets, such as those found around Jupiter.
