

Russia's Lead in Rockets Attributed to Fuel Control

Washington—(Science Service)—Russia has been able to lead in rocketry because of advanced control over fuels, Dr. Roger R. Revelle, a divisional committee chairman of the National Science Foundation, reports in testimony, part of which was just released and part of which is still classified.

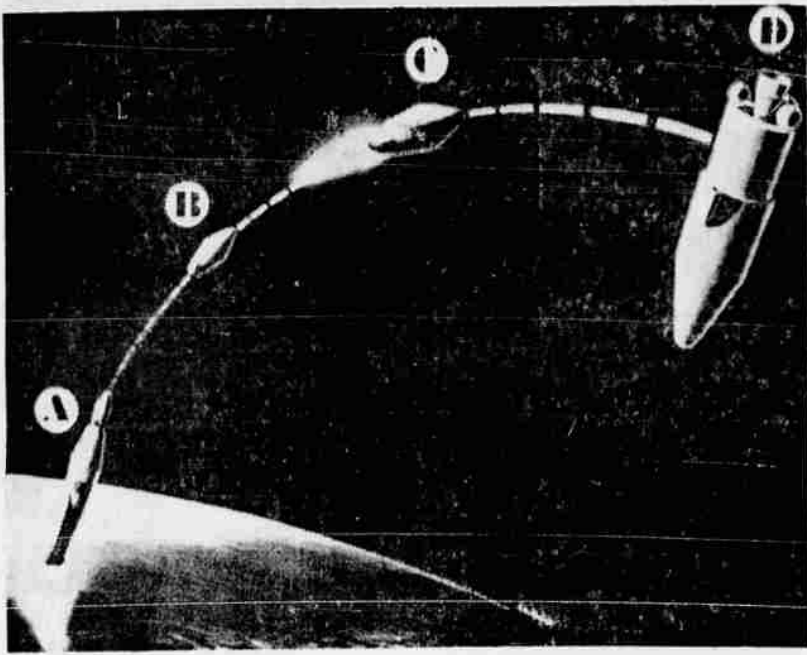

Dr. Revelle, who is also director of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography, said: "In space research, we are familiar with the fact that the Russians have rocket engines with three or four times the thrust of any of ours. This is not due simply to a massive effort, but to a systematic development."

"The Russians started with small rockets and worked up step-wise, very thoroughly, to big ones."

"Apparently their ability to produce engines of such large thrust depends upon a very knowledge of the performance of the rocket fuels, both the liquid and the solid."

"They evidently have much more control over their fuels than we have over ours, and can predict their performance better."

Rep. Harold C. Ostertag (R-N.Y.) asked, "What do you mean by 'control over the fuels?'"

Nixon Appeals for Republicans to Back Foreign Aid Program

Washington—(AP)—Vice-President Richard M. Nixon has taken the unusual step of appealing directly to House Republicans to stand by President Eisenhower's foreign aid program in the aftermath of the summit collapse.

Nixon's plea to the 20 Republicans on the House Appropriations committee was part of an apparent administration drive to buttress the mutual security effort in the face of Soviet Premier Khrushchev's threatening actions.

The vice-president warned that a sharp aid cut "would be regarded by the world as a head-long retreat by our country." He said such an act would be "inconsistent" with national honor and interests and be "an act of irresponsibility on the part of our party."

"I need hardly underscore the fact that recent events have demonstrated even more clearly than before, if possible, the absolute need for keeping our mutual security effort operating at an efficient level."

"One thing is certain: Now is not the time for any of us to appear to slacken or waiver in our determination."

Herbert G. Klein, Nixon's press secretary, said he doubted if "any vice-president" ever before had intervened on a legislative issue as Nixon was doing on the aid bill.

Astronomers Using Faulty 'Yardstick'

London—(Science Service)—Astronomers may be using a faulty "yardstick" to measure the vast distances of the universe.

Dr. Paul W. Hodge of Harvard College Observatory said recent studies have shown that the methods now used for determining distances to galaxies far beyond the Milky Way galaxy, in which the sun and its planets are located, are incorrect.
